WARRENS beneath the GLACIER

Ice Age Horror by J.C. Connors

ABOUT THE ADVENTURE

Warrens Beneath the Glacier is a Call of Cthulhu ice age adventure with Lovecraftian horror undertones. It can easily be adapted to other systems (a GURPS version is also available on www.1shotadventures.com).

The adventure is set over 30,000 years ago in the Blue River Valley, somewhere in Europe, long before the dawn of civilization. The adventure is a loose sequel to Canyon of the Snow Cairns, but takes place decades later. Players do not have to have experienced Canyon of the Snow Cairns to enjoy this adventure!

In this adventure, the Clan of Three Claws is facing the harshest winter known in generations. Food is scarce and the rivers are frozen. The tribe is desperate and needs to find shelter, so it sends several groups of scouts to the nearby hills to search for warm caves so that their people can survive. These hills, however, are ancient and inhabited by the degenerate Voormi-Men, a people who worship the Black Thing Beneath the Glacier. As these two groups collide, the investigators stumble into the Voormi-Men's plan to use sacrifices to awaken their horrifying slumbering god.

The adventure is suitable for four-to-six primitive pulp investigators. The end of this adventure includes six pregenerated characters so you can get started right away.

Characters introduced for the first time in the adventure are noted in ALL-CAPS. Skill rolls are in SMALL-CAPS. Sections marked with a map icon are side-quests and adventure hooks, and not important to the overall plot of the adventure. Sections marked with a person icon are opportunities for specific characters, notably the pregenerated characters from the end of this adventure.

ADVENTURE SUMMARY

A thousand years ago, the savage, three-toed Voormi-Men lived in the deep caves under the mountains of prehistoric Europe. These primitives kidnapped both Cro-Magnons and Neanderthals alike and dragged them deep under the earth, to sacrifice them to their foul frog gods, hoping that one day they would awaken Zhothaqquah, the Black Thing Beneath the Glaciers.

Eventually, the Neanderthals found several of the deep shafts that led into the Voormi-Men's home and sealed them with heavy stones. For generations, the Voormi-Men's attacks stopped, and they were rarely seen.

COLD WEATHER ROLLS

Temperatures routinely plunge well below freezing in the hills, and the bitter winds make travel especially dangerous. Travelers face frostbite, hypothermia, and exhaustion.

For every half-day of travel, each PC makes one CON roll. A PC with Survival skill of 60% or higher gets a bonus die.

On a failure, the PC arrives freezing and exhausted and suffers 1D4 HP damage from cold weather maladies.

Note that this roll assumes the PC is wearing typical winter clothing (furs and hides), otherwise the roll would be Hard! If a PC holds a black marble, an Ember of N'kai (p. 5), then they can roll a bonus die on their cold weather rolls.

However, if someone has taken 3 HP or more damage from the cold, future CON rolls also get a penalty die until they stop, build a fire and wind shelter, and rest for a few hours.

Recently, however, one of the stone seals broke. Dozens of Voormi-Men crept out from their tunnels. Their sacrifices began again, and with them came the harshest winter in a generation.

Now, game has vanished, the rivers have frozen, and nearly thirty clan members from the Blue River Valley's largest tribe, the Clan of Three Claws, have died from the cold.

With little hope of surviving the winter, Chief Usam-Aha sends the investigators north into the Hills of Sleeping Bones, where a visiting stranger, a rare Neanderthal named Twig-Eater has offered shelter among his people.

The investigators cross a frozen river and traverse cold hills, only to discover that the Neanderthal settlement has been attacked and its inhabitants abducted. The survivors, two young Cro-Magnon children, whisper of savage, three-toed men and a terrifying creature known as "The Many-Eyed Hunger", whose unnatural roars paralyzed the villagers.

As the investigators search for the missing Neanderthals, they uncover clues scattered throughout the hills: a frozen, unnatural worm beneath a lake, strange black marbles carried by the Voormi-Men, and ancient cave paintings depicting the hidden passages beneath the mountains. Their journey eventually leads them through the sealed caverns and into N'kai itself – a cosmic subterranean realm – where they must confront the insidious Voormi-Men and rescue the surviving captives from the sleeping form of the elder god, Zhothaquah.

To survive, the investigators must decide how far they are willing to venture, and whether the secrets buried beneath the Hills of Sleeping Bones should ever have been disturbed.

A FRIEND IN THE NIGHT

The Clan of Three Claws has barely survived the winter. The clan has lost almost thirty people to the cold temperatures, including many children. Game has disappeared and the rivers are frozen and barely supply fish anymore. Their hide tents do little to keep out the night cold.

Young Chief Usam-Aha and his wisest elders believe that the cold will continue for at least two more months. They do not believe their clan will survive for that long.

A dozen miles to the north, however, are ragged hills that the nomadic tribe has not explored. They have been dubbed the Hills of Sleeping Bones after a girl had a nightmare about them several weeks ago. She died two nights later, frost covering her fair features.

As the tribe lies shivering in their hide shelters, a few dogs bark a warning. A lone, blue-eyed Neanderthal, his shaggy hair covered in frost, lopes into the camp and collapses by the fire. The tribe is surprised – Neanderthals have not been seen in a generation!

Keeper's Note: Decades ago, a respected neanderthal named Ten-Men lived with the tribe. The oldest tribe members may vaguely remember him from all those years ago.

After treating the Neanderthal, he wakes and thanks the tribe. He cannot speak their language, but he seems bright and communicates effectively with gestures. His name seems to be TWIG-EATER and he comes from the Hills of Sleeping Bones, where a small tribe of Neanderthals live. His tribe saw the clan's fires and knew that they would be freezing in the cold. The Neanderthals have shelter in the caves, and offer it to the tribe.

Through gestures, the investigators can learn more. Twig-Eater's tribe is only about thirty strong. There is a thermal spring in the hills that keeps the ground soft enough to dig up tubers and roots for sustenance. Occasionally they get lucky and can find an ibex to hunt. There are other animals too, like lions and bears, but they have not seen any since the winter began.

The tribe debates what to do. The elders deem it too risky to lead hundreds into the hills – an area they've rarely explored – without knowing what shelter awaits them. But they trusts Twig-Eater, recalling the old stories of Ten-Men, and soon Chief Usam-Aha calls for volunteers to cross the river and scout the hills and return quickly with news.

With the heavy snow on the ground, it's a cold, eight hour journey to the frozen river.

The Frozen River

The unnamed river lies buried beneath a sheet of blue-gray ice and scattered snow. Occasionally, the investigators hear a deep groan of shifting ice come from the river. In spots, investigators can see the flow of dark water under the ice.

A SURVIVAL roll knows that after weeks of freezing weather, the river is solid enough to hold a mammoth! Without this knowledge, the investigators will likely cross terrified that the ice will give way (and Keepers can terrorize them further with the sounds of cracks as they cross!).

In the middle of the river is a small island. Unusually, in the middle of the island is a sigil of thawed ground. Even though it is lightly snowing, any snow that lands in the muddy part of the sigil instantly melts away. The temperature around the sigil is slightly above freezing, too.

A closer investigation discovers that the mud is wet and soupy, filled with wriggling worms, and smells foul like offal. An Oc-CULT roll recalls stories of nature spirits that live deep underground. Perhaps a spirit's heat is strong enough to melt the snow?

Keeper's Note: While the investigators won't know this yet, this spot is the beginning of a new portal to the dark realm of N'kai.

The investigators can rest near the warm sigil, and stay warm enough to get a good night's sleep. However, anyone that sleeps near the warm ground will become Known to Zho-thaqquah, the Black Thing Beneath the Glacier. The immediate effect is that every day one of their teeth will turn black and fall out of their mouth. Further possible effects described later in the adventure.

Beyond the river, the investigators see white slopes rise beneath a pale winter sky, broken here and there by scattered trees, dark cliffs, and wind-scoured rock. Twig-Eater will point to a hill to the northwest that he says marks the home of his people.

The travelers then hear the sound of crunching snow and moving brush. Suddenly, exploding out of the nearby brush is an angry woolly rhinoceros. The rhinoceros charges Twig-Eater, knocking him into the air and into a nearby tree.

Woolly rhinos are territorial and extremely dangerous. After knocking Twig-Eater away, it pauses to lower its head and swing its massive horn from side to side. This is a threat display to get anyone else to stay clear.

 The pregenerated character Old Wolfpaw has encountered this particular rhino before – it was the same one that gored his shoulder a month ago, and left it infected!

If the investigators don't back off, slowly, it will charge again, and then repeat its behavior. It will only fight if they engage it, and even then, it will run away once it takes real injury (half of its hit points).

If the investigators actually kill the rhino, its hide can be turned into precious, warm fur cloaks! A typical tanning process would take a minimum of five days, but an untanned hide, while heavy (20-lbs), stiff, and unpleasant still provides a bonus die to cold weather rolls. An appropriate CRAFT roll will create enough fur cloaks for everyone. For each point by which the roll is failed, reduce the amount of usable fur cloaks by one.

After the rhino is dealt with, the investigators will find Twig-Eater severely injured and dying. He hands them a pouch of dried flowers and weakly points in the direction of his people. Then he expires. The herbs can be used as an effective poultice (restores 1 additional HP on a FIRST AID roll).

THROUGH THE HILLS

The investigators have a vague idea where Twig-Eater's cave village lies, but it is many hours walk up into the icy hills to get there. Getting to the village requires a NAVIGATE roll to efficiently find a path through the hills, which takes a half-day.

Failure results in a long trip which dead ends at a steep scree slope. Investigators must either turn around (and a second cold weather roll) or risk climbing up. This requires a CLIMB roll, else the character slides down the rocky slope for 1D4 damage and must try again.

Either way, as the travelers venture into the hills, snow flurries seem to follow them. As they climb into the hills, the narrow paths offer little room for error. The trails skirt sheer cliffs and heavy curtains of pale blue icicles hang above and below them.

The Stone Petal Totem

Halfway to the Neanderthal village, the investigators find a tall pile of rocks. Each rock sits atop a larger rock, and the structure is easily ten-feet tall. Irregular geometry is scratched into each rock in simple patterns. Some of the rocks also have crude drawings of flowers on them. This totem was built by the Neanderthals to mark where a rare patch of medicinal flowers grows, but investigators will not know that unless they make an appropriate ART or HISTORY roll.

A Spy From Above

As the investigators near the Neanderthals' home, a SPOT HIDDEN roll spots a silhouetted figure far up on a cliffside watching them from inside a cliff cave. The figure is hairy and stooped, and when he detects that he is being watched, he ducks back inside the cave.

Keeper's Note: The investigators will not know this, but this is a Voormi-Man scout, watching for survivors from their recent attack on the Neanderthals.

If the investigators are brave enough to scale the steep cliffside, they must make two CLIMB rolls: one to get started and another to reach the cave from 30 feet up. A fall from here results in 3D6 damage!

The cave is small and cramped, its rough stone walls slick with moisture and its floor littered with loose rocks and old ibis bones. An old stone knife and handful of blunt arrows are mixed in with the bones.

In one corner lie several scraps of strange, thin leather, pale and rubbery to the touch, with an unpleasant, musky odor. A successful NATURAL WORLD roll strangely identifies them as frog hide, though the scraps are far larger than any such creature should possess. There is no sign of the scout. A narrow crack in the rear wall, barely wide enough for a child to squeeze through, appears to be the only other exit.

THE NEANDERTHALS' HOME

Halfway up a tall hill, the investigators find the Neanderthal's settlement. The settlement clings to the hillside, half sheltered within a broad shallow cave and half in a cluster of crude huts made from animal hides stretched over frozen branches. The hide huts sag beneath the snow, and cold fire pits and simple, broken tools litter the ground. The village appears to have sheltered two dozen or so people, but there is no sign of its inhabitants or where they might have gone.

The Exterior Huts

Ten or so hide huts are on the outside of the large shallow cave. Some of them look like the neanderthals tried packing snow around and on top to better insulate them.

The interior huts are sparse and only contain some bedding, a few baskets of tubers, and an occasional basket of dried flowers or herbs. A thorough search can find a useful tool or two, but these are limited to stone knives, simple stone hammers, some fishing line, or a spear.

The Ladder

A short ladder of branches – barely sturdy enough to hold an adult – climbs ten feet up a rocky wall to a snowy slope that curves around the mountain toward a stand of trees below. Deep grooves in the snow suggest that sleds have frequently traveled this route.

The Shallow Shelter Cave

There are more belongings in this cave than in the huts: hide cloaks and bedding, necklaces of animal teeth, stone knives and scrapers, and bundles of dried ibis meat. Animal bones, antlers, and flint flakes lie scattered around a small fire pit, and several pieces of red ochre rest beside a flat stone used for grinding pigment.

Personality

Fierce Little Mouse has a strong sense of duty towards her tribe of Neanderthals (especially Kon-Non her adoptive mother), as well as her brother.

The northern cave wall is beautifully decorated with painted geometric patterns. They resemble the stones of the Petal Totem found along the path to the settlement, but are far more mesmerizing. Anyone staring at the cave painting for more than a few moments finds themselves lost in its strange geometry, their eyes following one pattern into the next. The longer they stare, the more the patterns seem to intertwine, forming shapes that the mind cannot quite fathom.

The cavern is well-protected from the freezing winds, and is spacious enough for at least a hundred people. It looks like the Neanderthals moved most of their population into this cavern when the weather got colder.

If the investigators carefully search the cave, they find some suspicious items. Several of the hide blankets are covered in blood that looks days old. There are also a few broken spears in the corners of the cave, their tips shattered when they impacted the wall.

A Hard TRACK roll finds some odd three-toed prints among the more normal footprints of the Neanderthals. An OCCULT roll recalls old tales of primitive, cannibalistic subhumans who had only three toes.

In the far end of the cave is a crack in the wall, barely big enough for a man to squeeze through. A LISTEN roll at this crack hears something moving inside it.

Only people who are SIZ 40 or less can squeeze through the crack. After a few yards, it opens up into a dim chamber. Here, hiding in the chamber is LITTLE MOUSE, a 10-year old Cro-Magnon girl. She's terrified at first as she's approached,

EMBERS OF N'KAI

Scattered in the deep underground are mysterious black marbles known as to modern scholars as the Embers of N'kai. They are warm to the touch and help people survive the coldest temperatures (see Cold Weather rolls, p. 1). The Voormi-Men, used to the warmer temperatures of their caves, carry them to keep warm on long, outdoor journeys.

The embers also allow entrance into black portals that connect the Earth to distant dimensions and times. In this adventure, the embers allow entry into the Great Citadel of Ta-Shon, located on an island ten thousand years ago. The island was the original home to the Voormi-Men, before they began worshipping Zhothaqquah and abandoned their island for the eternal darkness of N'kai, where they devolved and became the savage subhumans they are today.

but when she sees that the investigators are not hungry cave lions or more Voormi-Men, she embraces them and weeps uncontrollably for a while.

Little Mouse

Little Mouse speaks in a strange dialect. While she is difficult to initially understand, if she speaks slowly the investigators can get the gist of what she is saying.

 The pregenerated Bone Mender recognizes the girl's dialect from a neighboring tribe he once traded with. He can understand her perfectly.

- If asked who she is... Little Mouse gives her name and explains that she and her brother has lived with the Neanderthals for two years, since her parents died while traversing the hills, killed by a cave lion.
- If asked about why she's hiding... she explains that several nights ago, hunched figures crept into the settlement at night. The men were silent, hairy, and terrifying, and had hook-shaped nails. They attacked with twisted black clubs, and began gathering the Neanderthals up. She says that the Neanderthals tried to fight back but were not good at it. Soon, she heard a horrible scream, "worse than a cave lion," and all the Neanderthals fell to the ground in spasms. She squeezed into the crack to hide, and she saw her teenage brother JEL climbing up the ladder. "He is a fast sled boy and probably sled down the hill to escape."

- Where are the Neanderthals? She does not know what happened to the Neanderthals. They were all gone by the time she peeked from her hiding spot. She is hugely upset by their disappearance, as they were her only family.
- If asked about Twig Eater... she knows him well and saw him as an older brother. She was the one who asked him to find more Cro-Magnons like herself to join them in the camp. If she learns of his death, she breaks down into sobs.
- If asked about other Neanderthals... she mentions a Neanderthal woman named Kon-Non, who acted as her mother since her parents died.
- If asked about the mesmerizing cave painting... she says it was painted by the Neanderthals' elderly spiritual leader. She does not know his name, he was just known as the Bearded One. He was old and disappeared a year ago.
- If asked about the leader of the Neanderthals... she says they don't really have one, as far as she can tell.

Finally, Little Mouse gives the investigators a round, inky black marble covered in scratch marks that are somehow blacker than the stone itself. It is warm to the touch (see Embers of N'kai, p. 5). She says the stone rolled into the crack in her cave when she was hiding. She saw a strange shaggy man reach in to find it with his hook-claw nails, but he was unable to retrieve it and left. She doesn't know what it is.

She asks that the investigators to find her brother and "mother," but she is not much help. Fresh snow has covered most of the Voormi-Men's tracks.

The Northern Slope

Little Mouse's brother Jel escaped the attack by climbing the ladder out of the settlement and sledding down the hill. Even though snow has covered most of the Voormi-Men tracks, there are deep enough grooves in the snow on the hill to show that it was used for sledding.

Nearby the ladder, half-buried in the snow is a second sled. A SPOT HIDDEN roll will find it. The sled is crudely constructed, no more than two wooden runners lashed together with rawhide thongs. A leather strap is attached to pull it across the snow. It's big enough for two.

Little Mouse explains that the Neanderthals built sleds to carry game up the mountain in the winter, but her brother loved to race down the mountain in one, something that only Twig-Eater found entertaining.

Sledding down the hill safely requires a PILOT BOAT roll. Otherwise, they crash and tumble at some point, taking 1D4 damage and the sled has a 50% chance of breaking. Without the sled, the slope is treacherous and requires caution. A suc-

THE MANY-EYED HUNGER

The Many-Eyed Hunger was a cave lion who was twisted by the energy of the Black Thing Beneath the Glacier. The horrible thing has grown several additional eyes in a random pattern across its forehead, its nose has lengthened into a disgusting proboscis, and its front paws have become three-clawed talons. It must eat a sentient being at least once every few days, or it dissolves into a pile of disgusting ichor.

While it is by no means domesticated, it avoids attacking Voormi-Men since they feed it with one of their own, or one of their captives, regularly. When the Voormi-Man scout saw the investigators, he summoned the Hunger to follow them.

If the investigators spend the night at the Neanderthal settlement, they awaken to the Hunger's unnatural roars. Recognizing the sound from the attack, Little Mouse rushes to hide in the back of the cave. The Hunger continues bellowing for at least an hour, but attacks only if it can catch one or two people separated from the group. Eventually, it stalks away, returning the following night. By then, its hunger is insatiable, and it will attack the group regardless of their numbers.

The Hunger prioritizes prey who are not Known to Zho-thaqquah. After downing a foe, it will drag the body into the hills to devour.

BEHIND THE BACK HILL

To find Little Mouse's brother, Jel, the investigators must travel north of the Neanderthals' settlement.

A - The Slope Ends

After about five hundred yards, the sledding slope ends in a valley between two larger hills. Thick snow has gathered here, making it slow-going. A SPOT HIDDEN roll spots Jel's sled hidden in some thorny brush nearby. However, no tracks are visible due to recent snowfall.

Little Mouse tells the investigators that Jel liked to sled down this hill and then either visit a high point, which overlooked the mountains, fish in the lake near to the west, or explore an old cave to the north. She knows the game trails in the area reasonably well, but struggles in the deep snow. One of the investigators will have to carry the girl if they want to take her with them.

B - The Fallen Tree

A massive dead tree is here, cutting across the path. A corpse is crushed underneath. Investigating the corpse shows that it is a Voormi-Man, a stocky and shaggy primitive man, with three toes and sharp teeth. His bones are shattered, and there are signs that the tree was toppled on to him.

The man carries no belongings, but in his left hand is another inky black marble, identical to the one the investigators may have been given by Little Mouse. His palm looks slightly injured by the marble, a strange pattern burned into his flesh.

Nearby is a wicked club with lion fangs pushed through parts of it. The man's been dead for at least a couple of days.

C - The Ice Lake

This lake has been a prime fishing spot for the Neanderthals for many years. Now, it is frozen solid, its ice thick enough for a man to walk across.

In the middle of the ice lies a snow-covered mound, vaguely shaped like an S. Investigating it reveals a massive, rotting worm, easily as long as three men, buried beneath the frost. Its pale, bloated body is frozen solid and appears to have been there for some time. Stranger still, its flesh is covered in unnatural ridges, with what appear to be several small, half-formed mouths along its length. This discovery warrants a SANITY ROLL (0/1D3).

An examination of the worm and a NATURAL WORLD or similar roll reveals that the worm is somehow still alive! However, until it thaws, it will not move again.

MAP OF THE BACK HILL BEHIND THE SETTLEMENT

Keeper's Note: The ice lake makes a good spot for the Hunger to attack. The slippery ice is difficult to traverse (move at half speed) and failed fighting rolls force a DEX roll to keep balance. The Hunger does not suffer any penalties, thanks to its sharp claws.

D - The High Point

Climbing up this steep slope ends at a breathtaking vista of the snow-covered hills. If it's daytime, Jel will be hiding among the boulders here, fearful that any strangers are more Voormi-Men come to seize him. He stays hidden until he's discovered, then he throws rocks at strangers to scare them away.

If Little Mouse is with the party, he'll be immediately comforted to see her and will trust them. Otherwise, they'll have to use good roleplaying or social skills to lure him out. Much like his sister, he talks in a strange dialect, but he's also adept at using gestures.

Jel's version of the night of the attack is similar to Little Mouse's. He counted over a dozen Voormi-Men attacking the Neanderthals. He escaped up the ladder and sled down the hill. He took shelter in the nearby bear cave (#5) but last night heard something moving in the cave with him, so he fled here and has been debating what to do.

- If asked about the dead man under the tree... Jel admits that he killed the man. After he sled down the hill, the Voormi-Man stalked after him. Jel knew the large tree was unstable, and pushed it over on top of him when he passed by.
- If asked about the black marbles... he does not understand them, though as he escaped the settlement he saw many of the Voormi-Men carrying them.
- If asked where the Voormi-Men took the Neanderthals... he isn't totally sure. However, he spied a party of Voormi-Men from the high point moving deeper into the hills two days ago, but they were too far and he couldn't tell where they were going.
- If asked about the worm on the lake... he shudders, and says that it appeared a week ago, bursting from a hole in the lake. It twitched, died, and froze over. The Neanderthals took it as a bad omen, but were too afraid to go near it.

During this conversation, investigators hear the unnatural roar of the Many-Eyed Hunger bounce off the hills. Jel shudders and says that he caught a glimpse of the thing the morning after he escaped. It was carrying the half-eaten torso of a "giant nosed Voormi-Man". He is terrified of the predator.

E - Grumble-Jaw's Cave

A generation ago a ferocious cave bear, Grumble-Jaw, lived in this cave, but he was cleared out by Neanderthals who scared him with torches and pushed him off a cliff. But they named the cave in his honor, and use it for sacred ceremonies, storage, and warmth for the young and the sick, as it is significantly warmer than their larger, shallow cave back at the settlement.

The cave entrance is hidden behind hastily piled, frost-covered branches. It is easy to spot if actively searching, but a casual passerby might miss it.

The entrance is large but quickly narrows into a tunnel that requires stooping. After a few dozen yards, it opens into a spacious chamber divided into smaller areas by natural stone pillars. Damp baskets lie scattered about, and a hide on the floor marks where Jel slept for a few nights.

Several cave walls are painted with reddish paint – mostly the same geometric patterns preferred by Neanderthals, as well as some primitive men and animals.

Sewn leopard skins cover a second chamber in the southern part of the cave. If asked, Jel or Little Mouse explain that it's a sacred chamber that they do not enter. Furthermore, Jel explains that section of the cave is where he heard the noises at night that caused him to flee the cave.

The sacred room has a large 5-foot oval stone on the floor. The stone is 1' thick, and weighs 3,500 lbs. It bears marks of being chipped and rounded by stone hammers. Carved on to it are more geometric runes, as well as a sigil that is identical to the one the investigators found in the river.

A HEARING roll hears a faint, persistent scratching beneath the stone, as if something trapped below is desperately trying to claw its way out. Occasionally, the scratching is interrupted by a louder sound, as if something hit the bottom with a stone hammer.

Keeper's Note: While it is nearly impossible for anyone to lift away, the stone covers a black portal that leads to the great Cavern of N'kai, a dimension that is home to indescribable horrors.

A red-painted wall depicts a primitive panorama of the valley, with several recognizable hills and landmarks. A strange sigil marks the location of Grumble-Jaw's Cave. Another appears on a mountain to the northeast, near where Jel spied a band of Voormi-Men traveling. See Handout A.

In the corner of the room is an old bear hide. It covers the skeleton of a Neanderthal. A necklace of fishbones is around his neck. Jel and Little Mouse recognize it as a necklace that belonged to Bearded One, the elder that worked on the cave painting back at their home.

THE VOORMI-MEN

The Voormi-Men are a primitive race of shaggy sub-humans that dwell in the lightless caves beneath the mountains. They walk hunched over on three-toed feet, their long arms ending in sharp, hooked claws with which they dig their burrows through the earth.

They are said to inhabit the deepest caverns, where they feast upon human flesh and worship forgotten gods that slumber far beneath the earth. Few have witnessed their shamanistic rites and lived to tell of them, but those who have speak of vile ceremonies and sacrifices that continue long into the night.

Disliking the bright light, the Voormi-Men typically emerge from the caves after dark to stalk their prey and defend their territory. Occasionally they have been known to barter with humans, as they seem to be incapable of making their own tools or fire.

Voormi-Men have no spoken language, communicating instead through guttural hoots, low growls, and crude gestures. Their strange cries echo through the mountain caves, sometimes seeming to come from depths far greater than any known passage could reach...

Most carry bone clubs, or use their sharp claws as weapons. Ones traveling outdoors usually carry Embers of N'kai, to keep themselves warm.

TREK TO THE VOORMI CAVE

Once the investigators have been to Grumble-Jaw's cave, they should deduce, with Jel's help, that the Voormi-Men took the Neanderthals to another cave to the northeast. A NAVIGATE roll estimates the trek to take another day of travel, which will require another two Cold Weather rolls.

While snow has covered a lot of the tracks, before long investigators who make a TRACK roll find evidence of the Voormi-Men: discarded fish bones stolen from the Neanderthal camp, a dropped hide, and even a handful of matted, shorn hair stuck to some brush.

The Fallen Wolves

Before long, the investigators find a small wolf pack that the Voormi-Men fought with on their journey back. Lying in the snow are several wolf corpses, as well as a dead Neanderthal (identified as KUTTER, one of the best fishermen from the settlement) and a dead Voormi-Man. Their throats were torn out by the wolves.

A LISTEN roll hears the sad whimpering of a wolf pup hidden in the brush. Barely six weeks old, the pup was abandoned when its pack fled from the Voormi-Men. Its gray fur is matted with snow, and it shivers from hunger. Though frightened, the pup is curious and will cautiously approach anyone offering food. A NATURAL WORLD or CHARM roll helps it to trust the humans, after which it will follow closely. It is easily startled by loud noises, however, and will quickly run and hide.

More Sigils

As the investigators climb higher and near the second cave, they find several more sigils, similar to the one near the river. Again the snow is melted and the exposed soil is warm and wriggling with worms.

The Trail of Frozen Waterfalls

Winding up the hill to the Voormi's cave, the investigators find a massive, frozen waterfall spilling over the trail. Great sheets of blue-white ice cling to the cliffside, forming a treacherous, uneven slope that drops hundreds of feet into the frozen valley below.

The trail has all but vanished beneath the ice, leaving only a narrow, slippery ledge along the cliff face. Jagged icicles hang overhead, while deep cracks in the frozen waterfall suggest that the entire formation could break loose without warning.

THE VOORMI-MEN WARRENS MAP

Two cave entrances are visible on the great ice ledge. The first is 20 yards away, the second another 20 yards to the north of the first. Far below them is the crumpled and frozen corpse of a Neanderthal, who clearly slipped as he was forced across the icy ridge.

Traversing the icy path is dangerous. Investigators must make a DEX roll every ten yards to carefully move across the ice.

- If a character is slowly walking, a failed DEX roll indicates a hard fall on to the ice (1D3 damage). Using a sturdy spear or similar tool makes the roll Easy.
- If a character is crawling or moving on their bellies, the roll is also Easy. However, a failure results in a spin towards cliffside, and a second DEX roll to prevent a catastrophic fall.
- If a character is smart enough to fashion crude ice grips out of branches or bone, the roll becomes Easy as well.
- A catastrophic fall down the ice waterfall does 3D6 damage as they slam into a ledge below, and leaves the PC in a very difficult position. Climbing up the icy slope requires rope or a Hard CLIMB roll!

Halfway to the first cave entrance, everyone feels a vibration coming from the mountain. They have moments to act. Suddenly, a disgusting man-sized worm bursts from the frozen icicles above them, sails out into the air, and then splatters to its death below. This causes a SANITY ROLL (1/1D3)! Those who hugged the inner wall for cover are safe, but those who didn't have sharp ice shards rain down on them. On a successful DODGE roll, they only take 1 HP of damage. On a failure, they take 2D3 damage.

THE VOORMI-MEN WARRENS

At the top of the icy hill is a large cave entrance. In the snow that has blown in the cave, it is easy to see both the three-toed footprints of the Voormi-Men, as well as at least a dozen of their Neanderthal captives.

A foul stench wafts from the cave – rank, swampy, and sick with the odor of rotting flesh. The cave is also dark past the first few rooms; explorers should bring torches, which they can craft with a SURVIVAL roll.

#1 - Sleeping Voormi-Men

On the cold floor in this part of the cave are five Voormi-Men. They sleep sprawled upon filthy hides. They make strange, wet wheezing sounds as they rest, occasionally twitching or scratching at themselves in their sleep.

In the middle of them lie bloody chunks of raw meat and splintered bones. A closer look reveals something horrifying: the butchered remains of a Neanderthal. Most of the limbs are gone, and the torso has been torn open and gnawed down to the ribs. This realization causes a SANITY ROLL (0/1)!

The Voormi-Men are light sleepers; a STEALTH roll is required to sneak past them. If the Voormi-Men are awakened, they will attack ferociously, trying to force intruders back on to the icy ledge to push them to their doom.

Note that these Voormi-Men have black marbles in their possession, as they use them to stay warm near the entrance.

#2 - Hanging Food

There are two hanging forms in this room, upside-down, their feet frozen into the high cave ceiling, at least four yards above the floor. Both are difficult to see in the gloom.

The first is a Neanderthal, BRIGHT FLOWER. He is unconscious and in poor shape. He is missing several fingers from his hands and is suffering from severe hypothermia. Freeing him and providing him warmth will wake him up after about 20 minutes.

Bright Flower cannot speak the same language as the investigators, but can gesture well enough to explain a few things:

- If asked about the other Neanderthals... he will point deeper into the cavern, and mime that they are sleeping and cold.
- If asked about his missing fingers... he will say that the Voormi-Men severed them and ate them.
- If asked about any dangers... he will point to the chamber to the south and signal that several Voormi-Men guard the cave from there.
- If asked about the other figure hanging in the cave... he looks uncomfortable and nervous, and says he does not know.

While Bright Flower is too injured to materially help the investigators without excellent roleplaying, he is willing to provide light assistance, such as keeping watch or guiding them to the deeper caves where the Neanderthals are held (area #7).

The second hanging figure is a unique specimen! At first glance, it looks a lot like a Neanderthal, but a closer examination finds differences. Its hair is thicker and matted, its ears are large and flapping, its arms are longer, and its eyes bulge weirdly. Most prominent is its long, fleshy nose. Realizing it's inhuman causes a SANITY ROLL (0/1).

An OCCULT roll identifies the thing as a Gnophkeh, a mythical degenerate human race from a faraway dimension of cold and ice. They worship a deity named Rhan-Tegoth, an enormous insect.

Keeper's Note: The Gnophkehs are a race of degenerates that hate the Voormi-Men. This is the last survivor of a group that attacked the caves a week ago. They are not to be confused with the Gnoph-keh, six-limbed, one-horned monstrosities that are intelligent and ferocious (and one appears in Canyon of the Snow Cairns adventure).

The Gnophkeh can be freed in the same way as the Neanderthal. Because he is hardier, he will recover much faster. He will grunt savagely and grab for the investigators' weapons, determined to get revenge on his Voormi-Men attackers. If he is not given a weapon, he will scream savagely (likely awakening the Voormi-Men in area #1), and then will attack everyone until he can seize one.

If the investigators are able to calm the Gnophkeh with good roleplaying, gesturing, and social skill use, he'll agree to accompany them. However, the Gnophkeh is still cruel, savage, and untrustworthy, and cares little for his new "friends."

The Gnophkeh knows the secret of the black marbles, the "Embers of N'kai". He will gesture to investigators to give him one so that he can use it to travel through the black portals that are present in the caves. If they refuse to give him one, he'll immediately seek out Voormi-Men to steal theirs.

#3 - The Insect in the Ice

The floor in this chamber consists of remarkably clear blue ice. However, something enormous is visible underneath the ice it, perhaps five yards away from the surface. Only blurry fragments can be made out – a jointed limb, a pincer-like mouth, and a cluster of dark circular shapes that might be eyes. The creature underneath is monstrous and huge. Worse, the thing isn't frozen in the ice, it seems to be peering at the living from the other side. Occasionally one of the dark shapes moves slightly, following whoever is standing nearest to it. Witnessing the size of the monstrosity causes a SANITY ROLL (1/1D6)!

This entity is an incarnation of Rhan-Tegoth, if not the thing himself, an insect-like cosmic elder god. If the Gnophkeh is with the investigators, he immediately rushes forward and prostrates himself before the peering mass. He encourages any others to do the same.

However, within minutes, the ice surrounding the creature begins to melt. The Gnophkeh (and anyone else foolish enough to mimic him) sinks slowly into it, until his ecstatic cries turn to horrific screams as he finally meets his god.

#4 - The Breathing Chamber

Accessing this area of the cave requires climbing down a short, 2-yard wall. This requires an Easy CLIMB roll. A failure results in 1D3 damage.

As soon as anyone sets foot in the lower area, they'll notice the floor and walls are unusually smooth. The temperature is noticeably warmer. And then, every few seconds, the entire lower chamber seems to expand, followed by the faint sound of escaping air. The cave area here seems to be breathing!

Anyone Known to Zhothaqquah will find it difficult to leave this place. They must make a POW roll or become overwhelmingly drowsy, wanting nothing more than to lie upon the floor and sleep. As they drift off, their breathing falls strangely in sync with the slow movements of the walls. Resting here has no direct ill effects, but leaves the sleeper vulnerable to discovery by the Voormi-Men or the Hunger.

If anyone cuts into the stone in this room, they'll find after a few inches of ordinary rock, a layer of black, fibrous, fleshy material. Damaging it causes slumbering Zhothaqquah, far away in N'kai, to awaken a bit more (see p. 14).

#5 - The Many-Eyed Hunger's Den

This alcove is where the Many-Eyed Hunger (p. 6) sleeps. The floor is littered with broken bones, cracked skulls, and scraps of hide torn to pieces. Deep claw marks score the walls, some reaching higher than any man could comfortably reach.

On the eastern wall is a perfectly round patch of black stone, perhaps three feet across. At first glance it resembles an enormous ink stain, but closer inspection reveals something more unnatural. There is no seam, carving, or change in the texture of the rock. The stone simply becomes black, swallowing the light that falls upon it. Staring into it for too long creates an uncomfortable impression of depth, followed by nausea.

This round area is a portal to the ruined citadel in Ta-Shon, a realm of darkness. The Many-Eyed Hunger can pass freely into the realm thanks to the black marbles in its belly.

Anyone carrying a black marble can pass through the portal into the distant past, emerging beside a gray obelisk in the Great Citadel of Ta-Shon (p. 15).

If the investigators haven't deal with the Hunger yet, there's a good chance it will be here. But if it has been badly wounded, it will be resting in Ta-Shon, and will only emerge if the investigators are noisy, or linger long enough in its den for their smell to waft through the portal.

#6 - The Black Crevasse

A deep pit blocks this passage. Peering into its depths produces the same dizzying nausea as staring into the portal in the Many-Eyed Hunger's den.

Anyone carrying a black marble who falls into the abyss passes instead into the Great Citadel of Ta-Shon (p. 15). Without one, they simply plunge hundreds of feet to their death.

The Voormi-Men have constructed a small bridge (1 yard wide, 4 yards across) over the crevasse, made from a few fallen logs hastily lashed together with strips of hide. Anyone with STR 70+ can push the bridge into the abyss. If the Voormi-Men ever fall back to this cave, they'll cross the bridge, destroy it, and then throw rocks at the enemies to keep them out of their deeper warrens.

#7 - The Ice Slide

The passage here slopes steeply downward into a tight passage. Its floor is slick with ice, formed by water dripping steadily from the stalactites above and freezing on the stone. The entrance was once sealed by a large, runed stone slab, similar to the one the investigators encountered in Grumble-Jaw's Cave. It has since been shattered, and its broken pieces lie scattered around the mouth of the passage.

Anyone stepping onto the slope must make a DEX roll to keep their balance. On a failure, they lose their footing and go slaloming helplessly down the passage into the depths below. If the roll is successful, the character can slowly make their way down.

Similarly, climbing up this slide is even trickier, and requires three CLIMB rolls to navigate. A good tool like a spear or hatchet can give a bonus die to the roll.

THE DARK OF N'KAI

Sliding down the icy tunnel is terrifying. The investigators have the sensation of falling through limitless blackness, beneath stars they have never seen.

The passage twists and plunges through the darkness, carrying the investigators faster and faster. Torches sputter and extinguish. A rhythmic and distant howling fills the tunnel.

Moments later, they tumble violently onto cold stone. They have emerged into N'kai, an impossibly vast subterranean realm whose ceiling is lost in darkness. Strange basalt idols rise from the gloom, some crudely carved, others unnervingly smooth and ancient. Everywhere are images of the squat, frog-like Zhothaquah, staring outward with heavy-lidded eyes and a grotesque smile.

At the center of the cavern is something immense. It is a mountainous heap of black, leathery flesh, squatting motionless in the darkness. Its general shape is disturbingly reminiscent of the idols of Zhothaquah – bloated, toad-like, and impossibly ancient. Its body seems half-formed, as though it has grown into the cavern itself. Great folds of flesh spill across the stone, while an enormous head hangs above them, its multiple mouths huge and sagging and filled with irregular teeth.

A dozen Neanderthals lie beneath the Thing Beneath the Glacier, scattered across the cavern floor in grotesque positions. Some are curled tightly upon themselves; others lie spread-eagled or twisted backward, their faces frozen in expressions of terror. Their skin has turned waxy and blue. Among them is KON-NON, Little Mouse's adoptive mother.

From beneath the creature's folds emerge long, fleshy tubes, enormous intestinal worms similar to the ones the investigators have seen before. One is fastened to each captive, its puckered mouth sealed against the chest, throat, or belly.

With every slow contraction, warmth seems to flow visibly through the translucent flesh toward the monstrosity. Frost creeps outward across the victim's body as it is drained of heat.

Several Voormi-Men shuffle among the bodies in a trance, apparently oblivious to the horror towering above them. They periodically stoop to poke, shake, or sniff one of the captives. When a Neanderthal no longer responds, the Voormi tears the feeding tube free and drags the frozen corpse aside.

This horrific tableau causes a SANITY ROLL (1/1D10). Anyone wearing the Neanderthal elder's necklace of fishbones (from Grumble-Jaw's Cave) rolls with a bonus die, as the ancestral spirits of old shamans steel the mind against such vile things.

The Voormi-Men Defenders

If the investigators tumbled uncontrollably down the ice slide, there is a good chance are immediately spotted. Make a SPOT HIDDEN roll for a Voormi-Man for each person that tumbled uncontrollably down the side.

If the Voormi-Men spot intruders, they rush forward to defend their great god from the invaders. Assume that there are three Voormi-Men per investigator, although the third wave will not show up until 2D6 turns into battle, as they rush out of some nearby tunnels.

Note that these Voormi-Men do not carry Embers of N'kai on them. They only use the marbles to stay warm when they travel far from N'kai. However, they do mine the marbles from this realm, and those who look for a spare Ember may allow a Hard SPOT HIDDEN roll to spot one or two of them somewhere nearby.

The Tendrils

If a someone ever falls unconscious here, a worm-like tendril will come from the monstrosity and attach to the PC, slowly draining them of their body heat over the next days and weeks.

The tendrils can be removed with a STR roll or destroyed with an attack; assume they 5 HP. Most Neanderthals will wake up after their tendrils are detached. Most will likely be too weak to help much in the fight. A PERSUADE roll might help to inspire some of the stronger ones, but they will be in a hurry to escape with their rescuers.

The Black Thing Beneath the Glacier

The Black Thing is half-asleep, enjoying the warmth generated by the Neanderthals. He barely notices the humanoids underneath its great mass. He is a cosmic elder god, or perhaps a great servant of one, and cannot be injured by primitive spears and axes.

However, if anyone gets too near the thing (including the Voormi-Men) and draw too much attention to themselves, the Thing will lazily sweep a massive clawed hand at them to pick them up. Treat him as having a Fight 25%, but he will grow more alert if the investigators have freed all of his Neanderthal sacrifices, or have stabbed at his flesh in the Breathing Chamber (Area #4), in which case he'll grab with more vigor (Fight 40%).

The Vhoormag worm is covered in puckered seams lined with sharp teeth. Anyone grappling it takes 1D3 damage per turn!

If someone is grabbed, the Thing holds them for a turn or two, carefully considering them (treat him as STR 90 for purposes of escaping). Then, he'll casually push the victim into its sharp-toothed mouth to swallow them whole.

1D4 turns later, the Black Thing spits what's left of its victim out. However, the belly of the Black Thing has transformed them into a Vhoormag, one of the great, mindless man-sized worms that burrow in the ice. The Vhoormag lands with a splurch on the ground and begins to attack anything near its maws.

The Maw Idol

One of the large idols near the Black Thing has an enormous maw on it. The inside of the toothy mouth is pitch black, similar to what the investigators may have encountered in the Many-Eyed Hunger's Den. This is another portal to the citadel of Ta-Shon, if someone possesses a black marble.

Escape!

With some luck, the investigators can free many of the Neanderthals and flee N'kai. There are three ways to escape:

Fleeing up the ice slide requires three CLIMB rolls; each failure sends the character sliding back down. Worse, the hook-clawed Voormi-Men can scramble after them with ease. Even if the investigators killed those in the chamber, they soon hear more emerging from the warrens of N'kai, closing in behind them.

If the investigators have gathered enough Embers of N'kai, they can escape through the portal in the Maw Idol. Each person who wishes to travel through the portal must carry at

THE FRAGMENT OF TA-SHON

The black portals in N'kai can transport someone to the Great Citadel on the island of Ta-Shon, as it existed over ten thousand years ago.

Eons ago, this was one of the many homes of the Voormi-Men, before they devolved and became degenerate worshippers of Zhothaquah, and followed him into darkness. Then, their citadels all fell into ruins, and eventually their island sunk beneath the waves. But visiting it through a portal places travelers just weeks after the Voormis left for N'kai.

The Great Citadel overlooks the Cinar-trel Sea. It is a vast, walled structure of black stone, squat and heavy, walls curving at impossible angles. There are no windows, and the great arched entrances look built for shorter beings. Everywhere there are the heavy-lidded idols of Zhothaquah, some small, others immense. A gentle and warm rain comes from dark and cloudy skies above.

The citadel is lifeless except for occasional fauna, especially odd three-winged birds flitting about. However, if the Hunger has been badly wounded, it may have retreated here to rest and heal, and it will defend its territory! Also, Voormi-Men may follow investigators into this time, although it is rare they will send more than a few at a time. They no longer recognize Ta-Shon as their past home, and instead find this place haunting and uncomfortable.

Wandering the citadel reveals takes many hours and discovers several more black portals to N'kai, each set within the gaping maw of a monstrous, toad-like idol of Zhothaquah. Like the other portals, the a black marble is needed to enter. Passing through one casts the traveler back into lightless N'kai, most likely back to the chamber of the Black Thing, or perhaps deeper within the forgotten warrens of the Voormi-Men. Those who enter blindly are unlikely to emerge anywhere survivable... and less likely still to find their way back.

There is also a tall, basalt obelisk in the citadel's largest courtyard. In the obelisk is another black portal. Around it are the paw prints of the Hunger. This one portal leads travelers back to the Hunger's Den in the caves (Area #5 in the caves).

least one Ember. This instantly transports them into a chamber somewhere in the Great Citadel of Ta-Shon, a fragment of time from 10,000 years in the past... which may prove a faster way of returning home, as there are portals that lead back to the ice caves.

Desperate investigators might flee into the side tunnels of the great cavern, where they face a dark labyrinth of endless corridors, bottomless shafts, and unimaginable creatures. The passages twist and descend into the depths of N'kai, where inhuman cries echo everywhere, threatening madness for those who wander for too long. Soon, the tunnels seem to shift, making it nearly impossible to retrace their steps. Eventually, wanderers may stumble upon another maw idol containing a portal to Ta-Shon, but Keepers can roll 1D6 to determine what horrors they encounter along the way!

Roll	Encounter
1-2	A pack of 1D6 Voormi-Men.
3-4	A writhing Vhoormag worm.
5-6	A formless spawn. These black, shapeless horror pour from the darkness, flowing over stone like living tar. Spears sink uselessly into its flesh and wounds close at once. This is not a thing men can kill, and must outrun. This is not a thing they can kill, only something they can hope to outrun. Unfortunately, it is much faster than humans...

CONCLUSION

If the investigators survive N'kai, then they have done well. While the Voormi-Men are undoubtedly still underneath the hills, they are not seen again for generations. Perhaps they were punished by the Black Thing, devoured, or disallowed to ever return to the world of light.

With the hills clear of danger, the Clan of Three Claws can venture to the Neanderthals' cave and shelter with them. The combined clan survives the freezing winter, and multiplies rapidly across the Blue River Valley for many generations to come.

For completing the adventure, the investigators receive 1D6 SAN points for success, good roleplaying, and excellent performance (i.e., rescuing over half of the Neanderthals, defeating the Many-Eyed Hunger, etc.).

Finally, anyone who survived the trip to N'kai may find themselves blessed with exceptional night vision, as their eyes seem especially suited to the darkness after such a trip into a subterranean dimension.

You were the youngest hunter ever to help bring down a mammoth! That was last winter, when your brother still laughed beside the fire. This winter took him, along with more than two dozen others of the Three-Claws. Since then, you hate being alone. You run farther than anyone, climb higher, laugh louder, and never show fear... but you always want another hunter at your side. There are things in the winter darkness worse than wolves, and silence reminds you too much of the dead.

You were bone-mender to another people until the snow swallowed the trail and took you from them. You wandered for days before the Three-Claws found you half-frozen. Their winter has been cruel: more than two dozen dead, and many more sick, hungry, or hurt. You mend their bones, share your food, carry their burdens, and ask for nothing. You want them to call you one of their own. But you know misfortune follows you. Sometimes, when no one is looking, you wonder if the terrible winter came with you.

You have killed bear, elk, wolf, and mammoth, and your great braided beard carries tokens from many hunts. But three weeks ago a woolly rhinoceros threw you into the snow and tore your shoulder. It escaped. You hate it for that. Worse, your arm still burns when you lift your spear. Worse, many Three-Claws have died this winter, and your people need their greatest hunter now. You will hunt through the pain. You will not sit beside the fire while your clan starves.

You have three children, and every night you listen to them breathe. More than two dozen Three-Claws have already died this winter. You will not let your children join them. You know roots, hides, seasons, animals, fire, and the old stories better than most hunters know their spears... and something about this winter is wrong. Cold comes and cold goes. This cold stays. You fear some spirit has been angered. Whatever it wants, you will find out.

Stone speaks to you. Most people cannot hear it. At night the spir- its show you shapes that must be cut, stacked, and raised beneath the sky. You make blades from black obsidian sharper than teeth, and the Three-Claws praise your hands,,, but also curse your wan- dering mind. You forget work. You lose tools. You begin one thing and dream of another. Now more dozens are dead from the ter- rible winter, and the spirits whisper louder every night. You want, just once, to finish what they ask of you...
