

ABOUT THE ADVENTURE

Roar of the Terrorghorger is a fantasy GURPS adventure, although it can be easily translated to other game systems (an OSR version is also available on www.1shotadventures.com). The adventure is set on the haunted coast of a faraway land, and challenges a group of foolhardy merchants to survive a trade in a cursed, vampire-ridden port. Soon, they find themselves on the run from dark entities, and have to survive a night in the primordial jungle surrounding the town before they return to their ship and make their escape.

Roar of the Terrorghorger is set in Warhammer's Old World, but can easily be moved to other fantasy settings. For example, in Yrth, the adventure might be set on a haunted island a few hundred miles east of Araterre. Or, it could even work in a fantastic, magic-infused version of the real-world 17th century Caribbean, where the PCs are merchants traveling to an island rumored to be inhabited by vampires who have fled old Europe!

The adventure is best for four-to-six ~150-point characters; the end of the adventure includes several pregenerated characters, including a newly-born vampire character for more experienced players looking for an interesting roleplaying challenge – or use this strange character as a replacement PC in the event someone dies!

Characters introduced for the first time in the adventure are noted in ALL-CAPS. Skill rolls are in SMALL-CAPS. Sections marked with a map are side-quests and adventure hooks, and not important to the overall plot of the adventure. Sections marked with a person are opportunities for specific PCs, notably the pregenerated characters from the end of this adventure.

ADVENTURE SUMMARY

The adventure is set on the southeastern shore of the faraway continent of Lustria, a land teaming with sweltering mangrove swamps, unknowable magic, and secrets older than the world itself. Few human settlements survive for very long on the primeval coast of Lustria, but one is the haunted port of New Bechafen – a town founded a thousand years ago by the mad vampire lord Luthor Harkon. Even today, New Bechafen is ruled by Harkon and his vampire kin, served by a vast number of undead minions and human slaves, with only a few living souls who call port home.

The ramshackle town is overlooked by its Temple of Undeath, a contemptuous building made from basalt and black marble. A thousand candles burn from its windows at all times. Anyone sailing near these shores knows this town's reputation – it is a place where no one lives voluntarily, and undead princes and their minions roam freely. Some folk even call the town "the larder" as a nickname, for it has enough mortal populace to feed the vampires here for years, should the coast ever come under siege by a powerful navy.

Every week, a few brave merchants land in the port to sell the rarest of wares to the vampire lords – artifacts, exotic slaves, and other peculiar trade goods. On just a few visits, a merchant captain can make a fortune here. However, it is unusual for a ship's entire crew to fully survive a night berthed at New Bechafen.

The PCs are among these brave merchants. They have just landed in New Bechafen aboard the Grimmest Gale, a merchant ship that intends to sell over a hundred crates of fine Bell Wine there. The wine became a popular commodity among the residents of New Bechafen, for it seems the men who drink this wine every day become immune to the diseases of the marshes; even the ravenous, chicken-sized bloodwasps seem to leave them alone. Here, the PCs must meet with their buyer, the vampire lord Baron Charybdis, who wishes to purchase the crates so that he can better protect the living servants of his plantation estate.

What the PCs do not realize is that Baron Charybdis is using the wine to secretly build an army to lead an insurrection against the long-time lord of the town, Luthor Harkon. However, Harkon's spies are formidable, and just as the PCs finish their deal, the tavern is overrun by Harkon's minions, determined to murder the would-be rebels. The PCs escape into the ancient catacombs beneath the town. Surviving the dark tunnels is not an easy feat, for they are inhabited by curses, old traps, and formidable creatures that have made them their home.

Emerging from the tunnels, the PCs find themselves deep in the wild jungles of Lustria, over two miles from the port city. Surrounded by primordial horrors, vampire renegades, and inscrutable lizardmen, the PCs must find a trail that will lead them safely back to the shore. There, they can avoid Harkon's lieutenants, sneak back to the Grimmest Gale, and escape the Vampire Coast with their lives.

The Adventure's Flow

The adventure is arranged in three parts. The first challenges the PCs to escape New Bechafen via old catacombs – this section plays out like a small, contained dungeon crawl.

The second part of the adventure is a sandbox, where the PCs must make their way back to the coast via several jungle trails, along with a mighty river. Wandering the jungle is a legendary Saurus oldblood riding a mighty carnosaur, who can stalk the PCs and block them off from the most direct routes back to town. GMs looking for a longer adventure can use the saurus to force the PCs to consider longer, alternate routes; GMs

A Gothic Gem in a Goblet

The exact winery that makes Bell Wine – the "gothic gem in a goblet" – is a closely guarded secret, but most connoisseurs agree it is likely made somewhere in the south of Bretonnia. Its label claims that the wine is made from grapes crushed in a thousand year old bell.

On visual inspection, this dark wine has an intense, almost hypnotic obsidian hue. Its bouquet is brooding, complex, and earthy with notes of blackcurrant, aged leather, and a tantalizing hint of blood orange. In addition to its delicious properties, the wine has the curious effect of protecting its drinkers from the various maladies of the Lustrian continent. After drinking a goblet, the imbiber gains +4 to all HT rolls to resist most diseases and venoms native to the continent, an effect that lasts about a week.

To vampires and other undead, however, the wine is poisonous. Even one sip forces a HT-4 roll. Failure inflicts 1d toxic damage and causes unconsciousness. This continues every 3 hours for two cycles.

A bottle of Bell Wine costs a pricey $25-50.

wanting a shorter adventure can just use the Saurus as pressure to move the PCs as fast as possible along a more direct route.

The final part of the adventure requires the PCs to make their way back to their ship, the Grimmest Gale, or another merchant vessels in port. They can either sneak back through town, or hug the coast to get back into the port. There, a final battle against Harkon's lieutenants awaits them, although the exact escape route that the PC chose may make this final encounter easier or harder for them.

ARRIVAL IN NEW BECHAFEN

The adventure begins with the PCs disembarking from their merchant ship – the Grimmest Gale – into the port of New Bechafen, the only real "civilized" town on the dread Vampire Coast. It is the early afternoon when they arrive.

To kick off the adventure, the GM should read or paraphrase the following:

As the blood-red sun slowly descends, your old galleon, the Grimmest Gale, makes its approach towards the accursed port of New Bechafen. The crumbling fortifications of the port loom ominously.

The town's great temple at its center is a leviathan silhouette of black marble consumed by creeping shadows and fraught with foreboding. A pervasive miasma of decay lay heavy on the air, as if the very stones of the port were imbued with the malignant curse of the fallen mariners. The echoes of forgotten cries of despair seemed to mingle with the lonesome call of the evening gulls, while the waves lap ominously against your creaking ship.

Doubt, as chilling as the northern winds, begins to gnaw at your resolve and that of your crew. The shimmering promise of wealth, enough to eclipse even the opulence of a Bretonnian prince, flickers like a treacherous beacon amidst the whirlpool of uncertainty. The urgency of your task brooks no delay, compelling you to disembark, to tread the eerie silence and meet the enigmatic Baron Charybdis at the ghostly hearth of the Gravesend Inn. A clandestine tryst is to be arranged, a moon-lit unloading of the coveted Bell Wine from the belly of your ship's hold. The promise of payment looms, a glimmer of cold hope, but once the gilded touch of the baron's coins fill your coffers, you must turn your back on this cursed port. Swift must be your departure, lest the suffocating shadow of a dark curse ensnares your galleon, dragging it to oblivion.

A letter from Baron Charybdis describes the procedure after docking (see Handout A): once the PCs' ship docks, the PCs must make their way to the Gravesend Inn to arrange for the delivery of the rare Bell Wine from their hold. Once the deal is struck, payment will be received, and the Baron's stevedores will unload the wine and take it to the Baron's estate.

As the PCs disembark from their ship, they are disturbed by the town's populace. Starved humans and elves, no hope left to glimmer in their eyes, work to unload the few ships in the port. Shambling zombies assist with the heaviest loads. Watching over the tasks are ghoulish overlords, neither dead nor alive, who are quick to whip their living slaves cruelly for any infraction. Even walking through the streets may call for a FRIGHT CHECK!

Fortunately, the Gravesend Inn is only a few blocks away from the port, and the path to it is clearly marked by wood signs, which also warn travelers not to stray far from the main avenues after sunset.

GM's Note: If the PCs include the pregenerated vampire character Theodulf among them, the new vampire does not begin with the others aboard the ship. Instead, he's at the Gravesend Inn already, skulking in the corner, near where the PCs are to meet the Baron. As the action picks up and Harkon's lieutenants accuse the group of treason, he is accidentally included in their lot.

Gresmar Stanislav Young Fugitive ST 12 HP: 12 DX Will: 8 11 Per: 8 IQ 11 12 HT FP: 10 Basic Speed: 5.75 DR: 0 Move: 5 Dodge: 8 Parry: 9

Traits: Appearance (Handsome); Enemy (Captain Tharkal); Fearlessness 1; Fit; Impulsiveness; Talent (Artificer) 1. Devoted to his girlfriend, Olisava.

Skills: Area Knowledge-12; Axe/Mace-12; Boating-11; Carousing-13; Carpentry-13; Engineer (Ships)-11; Sex Appeal-12; Smith-11; Survival-11; Swimming-13.

Gear: Hatchet (1d+2 cut, Parry 9, Reach 1); Cloth Pot Helm (DR 2).

Notes: Gresmar grew up in New Bechafen, and earned his place as an apprentice shipbuilder for Lord Harkon's navy. While reluctant to leave New Bechafen and his lover Olisava behind, Gresmar realized that to stay means certain death (or worse). Given the opportunity to escape, he will try to be as helpful as possible, using his knowledge of the area to help guide the PCs. GMs can use Gresmar as either a helpful ally, a victim that will soon be killed or eaten by the local terrors, or as a replacement PC should one of the PCs die along the way!

Dypolt Stanislav's Dilemma

As the PCs head towards the inn, they are approached by a middle-aged man with a thin face, bushy moustache, and fearful, bloodshot eyes. DYPOLT STANISLAV inquires whether they just arrived and the name of their ship, then nervously makes small talk, telling them that they should try the roast gull at the inn, or perhaps salamander tail if they have it. He insists on writing down his suggestions, and then hands one of the PCs a note.

The note (see Handout B) begs the PCs to find Dypolt's teenage son, GRESMAR, at the inn and smuggle him away from New Bechafen. Gresmar recently announced his love to a young woman, Olisava, not realizing that a vampire captain, Tharkul, had designs on that woman. Dypolt knows that when Captain Tharkul returns from sea in a few days, news of this event will spread to his ears, and Gresmar will no doubt be captured and horribly killed by the vampire. Dypolt will be reluctant to share this story in any but the most secure setting, and if asked for more information, will just beg the PCs to please listen to his plea.

A Deal at the Gravesend

The Gravesend Inn is a sagging structure built in the style of an Old World alehouse. Its owner, DIOGO, has an old deal with Lord Harkon that no mortal should be harmed in the inn. This is the place where deals are struck, gold is exchanged, and rare trinkets are traded safely... for the most part.

Only a handful of travelers are present at the inn today. Most are fellow merchants or envoys, each waiting to meet with a local captain or lord to conclude business. The tavern's owner is not present today, but his serious-faced daughter MARGA, serves local ale and food for those willing to pay. She'll ask who the PCs are meeting this afternoon; if the PCs respond truthfully, she'll say that the Baron already knows that they are here, and will arrive shortly. "His spies are everywhere, he knows the name of every ship that enters the port."

If the PCs look for young Gresmar, they won't see him. If they ask Marga about the boy's whereabouts, she'll say that he's hiding in the kitchen. Apparently, he's asked other merchants to take him away from this place, but they've all refused, too terrified of the wrath of the vampire lords to risk smuggling a fugitive out of the town.

Soon, BARON CHARYBDIS arrives. He is a tall and gaunt vampire lord dressed in black leather and a gray shark-leather cloak. He carries himself with the confidence of a warrior who has never known defeat. The baron is joined by a servant bearing a heavy coffer, a short man servant PONTIUS, who wears a shabby black hooded cloak. No matter how carefully the PCs try to peer into the man's hood, they only see the barest glimpse of a brutally scarred face.

The baron is polite, introducing himself to each of the PCs in turn, and then thanking them for making such an arduous journey to the town. He asks for them to confirm the contents of their hold – one hundred crates of Bell Wine – and then confirms the generous payment amount of 25,000 crowns.

The baron asks if they've brought a bottle for him to inspect. If they have not, he sighs with disappointment but still agrees to the payment. If they did bring one, he'll admire it, uncork it, and smell it with appreciation – but will not taste it. Instead, he pours a little out for Pontius, who sips it and announces that it is the best vintage he's ever tasted.

The baron will continue to make small talk, but at a dramatic moment, the door of the inn splinters inward and five skeletal warriors shamble into the place, led by NICOLE MORVANT, a stunning vampire dressed in an ornate leather jerkin, a blood-red coral helmet, and wielding a wicked sharp saber. A Perception (Vision) roll spots a complement of grave soldiers surrounding the inn.

Traits: Claws (Blunt); DR 2 (not skull); Fragile (Unnatural); High Pain Threshold; Increased Move; Increased Speed; Injury Tolerance (No Blood, No Brain, No Eyes, No Vitals, Unliving); Mute; No Sense of Smell/Taste; Single-Minded; Unhealing (Total); Unfazeable; Vulnerability (Crushing x2).

Skills: Shortsword-13.

Gear: Cutlass (1d+2 cut, Reach 1), rusty mail (DR 3).

The Sharkheart: One of the skeletons is an elite grave guard, an elite undead corsair that was once famous for his skill with a cutlass. He has Shortsword-15, Combat Reflexes (which gives him Dodge 11 and Parry 11), and wields a fine, cursed cutlass 1d+3 cut), which if it wounds an opponent, forces a HT-4 roll or else the victim suffers 1d toxic damage.

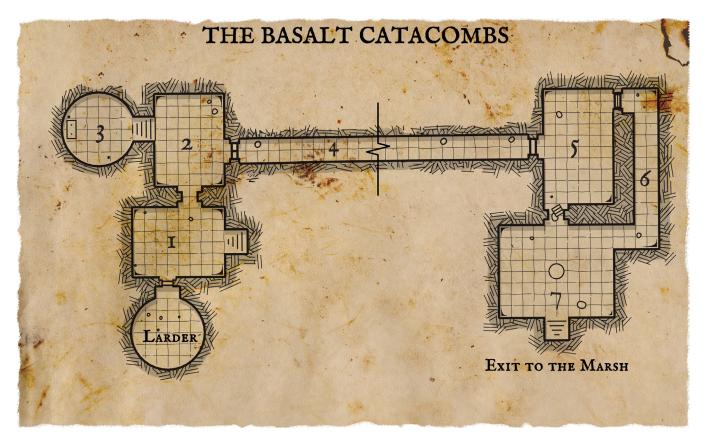

Notes: Remember that Injury Tolerance (Unliving) means the skeletons take no additional damage from impaling weapons. Their Fragile disadvantage means they automatically fail death rolls at -HT hit points.

"Baron Charybdis, your treacherous plot to overthrow Lord Harkon ends tonight," she announces. "He knows about your hidden army, and he knows about your plot to import and modify Bell Wine to unleash them upon this town and declare yourself its governor. You – and your fellow conspirators – are guilty of treason.

"But fear not," she continues, smiling at the PCs. "It is forbidden to kill mortals inside this house."

After a pregnant pause, she orders her minions, "Maim them and drag them outside to be cut open and deboned for the ghouls."

With no time for talk, the undead soldiers lunge at the PCs. After the PCs have defeated a few of the undead soldiers, Nicole orders a retreat, vowing to unleash all of Harkon's fury upon them. She shouts a command and the windows are immediately attacked by giant, sucking maws – writhing, Tentacled Things that are trying to squeeze their large bodies through the inn's portals.

GM's Note: The tentacled monstrosities exist to discourage the PCs from escaping out the front door. To dissuade them even more, announce at some point during the battle that Baron Charybdis has decided to flee. The vampire tries to climb out of a seemingly empty window. Suddenly, a tentacled thing wraps around him and squeezes his body grotesquely. As his limbs turn purple, and organs squeeze from his orifices, the PCs should think twice about escaping through these terrors. If they still attempt an escape, attack them with a "weaker" tentacle (ST 15, slaps for 1d+3 cr) before announcing that far more massive ones are breaking in!

The human inhabitants of the inn race to position tables in front of the windows, delaying the creatures from entering. The innkeeper Marga shouts to everyone – "quickly, into the kitchen, there's an escape there from the larder!"

Once inside the kitchen, Marga tosses a strong PC an iron crowbar to pry up a stone in the floor. She urges the PCs – and the baron – to jump down, explaining that a locked door in the larder below leads to the catacombs... and escape. "They cannot harm me, my father has a blood oath with Harkon himself... go!" she says, as she shuts the stone behind them.

THE BASALT CATACOMBS

The larder is a small stone room containing crates of foodstuffs, kegs of ale, and some working lanterns. If the PCs take a moment to search the larder, they won't anything especially unusual – just some dried sausages, a stained keg mysteriously labeled "Scion Blood," and a fine, centuries old large knife used for butchery.

A door in the northern wall is boarded up with heavy planks. Removing the boards takes a few minutes of effort, during which the PCs will hear screaming and shouting from above.

Once through the blocked door, the PCs find themselves in basalt, underground chambers. The first few chambers were excavated as gothic-style catacombs, complete with alcoves along the walls for the wealthy dead to be interred. However, there are no actual remains to be found. The great men that were meant to spend eternity in these halls here never actually died!

1. The Ashen Chamber

This room was once layered with a thick blanket of ash. The addition of dampness however, has turned the floor into uneven, hard cement. Stairs to the east once went up to a nearby building, but they are blocked with stone and debris. A Perception (Hearing) roll near the stairs hears the squelching sound of one of the tentacle monsters not too far away... almost as if it is burrowing into the earth to find prey.

Scattered in the corners of the room are the blackened bones of at least two men, but there is no sign of any skulls. A shattered rib cage still contains what looks like a charred wooden stake in its ribs.

2. Chamber of the Failed Dead

The chamber is filled with more empty alcoves, each decorated with primitive carvings of skulls, occult runes, and demon heads. Each alcove has a name carved above it, and PCs making a HISTORY roll will recognize some of the surnames – mostly ones of Imperial nobles from centuries ago.

3. The Petrified Prisoner

This round chamber holds a blood altar – an obscene table made from polished black marble, stained with dried blood streaked with handprints. A morbid chill permeates the air, the whispering echoes of unspeakable acts still clinging to the cold stone.

Around the room are rusty manacles, meant to hold prisoners that were to be sacrificed on the altar. Twisted into one of the sets of manacles is a tangle of thorns and branches. Only PCs who investigate this tangle and make an Occultism or Perception-4 roll will identify this tangle as a once-living creature (elven PCs roll at +4) – a dryad! The dryad, DRYS, was once imbued with an otherworldly grace but has been lifeless for centuries, bound within this tomb of horrors. She's now composed entirely of petrified saplings.

If the PCs drench the dryad in the essential water located along the wall in room 4, she will groan to life. Dryads are spiteful, angry creatures, and this one will pause only for a few moments before her face transforms into pure hate as she tried to tear her rescuers apart. However, quick words or gestures that reassure her that the PCs intend to return her to her homeland will stay her hand (i.e., a Very Good or better reaction roll).

4. The Long Hall

This rough-hewn hall extends over a thousand yards underneath the city. The hall is covered in massive black scorch marks – the ancient lizardmen escorted fire-breathing salamanders through this hall, into the Lustrian temple at its other end.

Now, the tunnel connects these catacombs of New Bechafen to the lower levels of the temple that was originally on this site, and after being conquered by Imperial soldiers, was turned into a fortification. Over the centuries, however, the temple has been forgotten and worn away with time destroyed, but some of its lower levels remain open.

A few dozen yards down the hall, the PCs will see a carved froghead on the northern wall, made from an unusual stone that is flecked with gold and silver. Spewing out of the frog's mouth is a stream of perfectly pure water — essential water. The water can be detected as magical by someone with Magery, and identified as essential water with an Alchemy roll. Anyone drinking the water stays quenched for a full day. It can also extinguish any magical fire with ease.

Traits: Bad Temper; Bloodlust; Body of Wood (DR 3, Injury Tolerance Homogenous, Fragile (Combustible), Immune to Metabolic Hazards); Combat Reflexes; Extra Attack 1; High Pain Threshold; Sense of Duty (Nature); Sharp Claws; Sharp Teeth.

Skills: Brawling-15; Camouflage-16; Climbing-13; Gesture-10; Stealth-12; Survival-14.

In combat, Drys fights like a fury, attacking with her sharp branches (2d+1 cut) and biting with her splintered teeth (2d+1 cut). Remember that her Injury Tolerance means impaling and pi++ damage only does 1/2 damage, and pi+ does 1/3, pi does 1/5 (so axes and other cutting weapons are the way to go!).

Normally, dryads can shapeshift into beautiful elven women, but Drys has zero desire to do that while she is so far away from the old forests of her homeland. While she can speak and understand Eltharin (the Elvish language), she rarely communicates with spoken language.

The hall eventually ends in a stone door that is carved with primitive glyphs showing lizard warriors, frog kings, and massive fire-breathing salamanders.

5. The Chamber of Beasts

This room was once used to hold various beasts — massive ropes are wound around giant cylinders attached to the room's stone walls. Pictograms of salamanders, ripperdactyls, swamp pythons, and other jungle monstrosities adorn the walls. Several obsidian-tipped spears of varying lengths can be found tipped up against the wall (treat them as cheap spears that do +1 damage due to the razor-sharp obsidian points).

The portal to the south is blocked by debris and rubble caused by a collapse in the tunnel ages ago. It's possible to squeeze through the rubble, but requires an ESCAPE or DX-5 roll to do so. Also, anyone attempting this feat will take 1d-3 cut damage as they make their escape. It's also possible clear the debris with a few hours of work, although venomous ants have made their home here. After a few minutes of digging (or after one person has already squeezed through, two 1-yard swarms of ants will emerge to envelop anything in their path!

The ant swarm hits automatically and does 1 hp damage per turn (with typical medieval armor protecting for 5 turns before they burrow inside). The swarm is dispersed after taking 12 HP of damage, though swarms are diffuse and typically take no more than 1 point of damage from an attack.

Anyone approaching the door in this chamber can make a Perception (Hearing) roll to hear bellow-like breathing on the other side of the door.

6. The Sleeping Salamander

A fresh breeze carries the damp, musky scent of the jungle to the PCs' noses. However, a massive, red-skinned salamander is asleep in this corridor, sleeping on a pile of charred bones, and nearly blocking the path with its large body. The predator is the size of a hippopotamus, with a large fan-like frill on its back, which occasionally pulses with a dim, but fiery light.

Anyone making an appropriate NATURALIST, AREA KNOWL-EDGE, or similar roll recognizes this creature as a red salamander. Red salamanders are fast, ill-tempered, and spit corrosive fuel from their bellies to ignite their prey and cook them alive.

Sneaking past the reptile requires a STEALTH roll vs. its PERCEPTION-3 (Typically Perception 9 – the salamander rolls at +7 due to its Discriminatory and Acute Smell, but -10 for being asleep, for a total -3 penalty). If the PCs take note of the breezes and time their escape when the breezes have died down a bit, the salamander rolls at an additional -3.

If the salamander awakens, it is delighted to find dinner so near to its lair. It will fill the corridor with fire and charge forward to devour the PCs!

If the salamander is killed, the PCs will spot a primitive copper charm in the pile of bones (GM's may let PCs spot it underneath the creature as they sneak past with a PERCEPTION (VISION) roll as well). Crafted and blessed long ago by skink priests, this amulet, the Blood Charm of Xahutec, protects its wearer from harm. It is enchanted with a modified Shield spell that provides DB+2 from arrows, javelins, and other thrown missile weapons.

7. The Tablet of Sotek

A stone pedestal is the centerpiece of this chamber. Suspended with a sorcery unseen, a tablet of stone, carved into the semblance of a serpent, hovers above it. A beam of sunlight hits the tablet's rough surface, and from some angles looks like it is made from molten gold. This is the magical Tablet of Sotek, the heart of the temple that now lies in ruin.

Anyone making an appropriate Thaumatology, Occultism, History-4 or Archaeology-4 roll recalls that such tablets

A serpent's bite is a powerful neurotoxin. Victims must make a HT-4 roll after ten minutes, and then every hour for three hours. While the spells on the tablet are written in an ancient, dead language of glyphs, the tablet will infuse those spells into anyone with magical capability (i.e., Magery)... at some risk to the subject's sanity, as this magic was clearly designed for the lizard folk of this region, not for man or elf.

Blocking the sunlight that surrounds the sacred tablet, however, incurs the wrath of the serpent god, Sotek. The ceiling shakes, and the room is enveloped by the sound of angry hissing. Within a few seconds, venomous serpents with enormous, unnatural heads begin dropping down from ceiling. Three snakes drop every turn, up to the three snakes per PC. Chant-hissing in a long dead language, the snakes angrily attack whoever dared to incur Sotek's wrath! Note that this noise will wake the salamander in the previous hallway, who will charge into this chamber looking to make a meal of snake or man!

If the tablet is touched, the subject must make a FRIGHT CHECK-10 as the serpent god's secrets overwhelm his mind with visions of the god coiling around him in fury, and then the god's fanged jaws descending upon him, spewing rivers of burning blood. Then, if the subject has Magery, two spells are burned into his mind: Fascinate and Hawk Vision, each granted at IQ-2, with no need for prerequisites. GM's can give these spells for free, or require the player to pay 1 character point per spell at the end of the adventure, if this adventure is part of a continuing campaign. Sa'Ludge is a docile, dutiful creature who loves pleasing his skink taskmasters. He has an eye for the perfection of angles, and will always correct thinks that look askew to him. While he is quiet and curious, if threatened, he enters an enraged, bloodthirsty state, snapping foes in half with his powerful jaws and devouring them as he fights.

In the south wall of this room, slippery stone stairs climb upwards to the jungle above.

THE PRIMORDIAL JUNGLE

Unless the PCs have dallied over ten hours in the catacombs, they will likely emerge into the jungle during the night. The dark jungle is cacophonous, and the nightmarish sounds of predators eating screaming prey are everywhere.

GM's Note: Some of the encounters below will change depending on whether the PCs are traveling during the day or night. PCs who make an Area Knowledge+2 or Survival+2 roll will recall that nights are generally more dangerous in Lustria. But they will also realize that if they do not get back to their ship soon, there's a risk that Captain Drossel will assume they are dead and will leave without them. Captain Drossel, however, has a sense of duty to his crew and won't depart until the following evening, giving the PCs plenty of time to get back to port.

1 The Jungle

The PCs emerge into a clearing that is littered with crumbling stone plinths of ancient design. It is obvious to anyone that this used to be a sacred site, but there is now little left. Primitive carvings of lizardmen fighting elves with elongated helms can be seen on many of the stones. A HISTORY roll recalls wars over magical sites between the lizardmen and the dark elves of old.

Once the PCs get their bearings, a Navigation+2 roll places the PCs about two miles west of New Bechafen and its port. To get back to their ship, they must trek through the jungle, sneak into the walled town, and make their way to the docks no doubt guarded by undead soldiers. Even with the trails, journeying through this savage jungle will take a few hours.

The Labor of Lizards

Moments after the PCs emerge into the moonlight, they find themselves staring at a massive, 9-foot tall hulking lizardman – Sa'Ludge, a kroxigor. The creature is in the middle of righting a massive stone plinth – easily weight a ton or more. When he catches sight of the PCs, he freezes, holding the weight awkwardly, his muscles bulging. A gleaming and ornate brass chain rattles around his neck, valuable stones glittering in the moonlight.

Unless interfered with, the kroxigor will heave the heavy stone in place, spend a minute or two adjusting it to catch the moonlight in just the right way, and then trudge into the jungle. Kroxigors are primarily labourers, unless they are interfered with... in which case they will become unstoppable, alpha predators.

Sa'Ludge's heavy necklace is valuable, worth at least $2,000, with a diamond in its center acting as a 12-point powerstone, but with the quirk that it only functions outdoors in warm climates. While Sa'Ludge is unlikely to part with it without violence, PCs might try to barter for it. Sa'Ludge likes shiny things, and also warm-blooded, live food.

2 Crossroads

On the ground in this clearing are dozens of seemingly splattered brains covered in fine, white hair. These grotesque globules are actually tlaxfruit, melons that grow high in the trees and fall to the ground in a messy clump. A Survival or Naturalist roll identifies them as edible (and delicious). Three trails wind outwards from this clearing.

- To the south, the PCs hear the rushing of water, which they recall is the river that leads straight to New Bechafen and the sea.
- To the north, they see an old game trail. As they stare up this path, the PCs hear faint whispers echoing on the humid jungle breeze. The whispers are in a long, dead language. At night, the PCs also see a faint red-orange emanating from that direction, pulsing as if in some sort of message.
- Finally, there is a path to the east, which also likely heads to New Bechafen, although through the wild dangers of the Lustrian jungle.

The PCs may also smell something rotting nearby, contrasting with the sweet smell of the tlaxfruit. A Perception (Smell) roll finds the freshly severed tail of some kind of great lizard, buzzing with flies. Any investigation of this carcass discovers it was cleanly bitten off by something large and carnivorous. Also, a Tracking+4 roll finds the fresh prints of a carnosaur – a massive two-legged alpha predator. Near the footprints is a primitive short spear, its bronze tip coated in blood and loose scales.

3 Statue of Adohi-Kumquata

A twenty-foot tall statue of a long-dead frog god sits in this clearing. The vine-covered and pitted statue has enormous black, glassy eyes, which still stares downwards from its great height with alien judgement. In its hand, it holds the copper-coated skull of an ancient kroxigor. At nighttime, this skull flickers with a dim golden light, the result of the magic used in its creation.

Using Rotl Grotl

The jungle near New Bechafen is roamted this night by the famed Saurus warrior, Rotl Grotl, and his mount, a monstrous carnosaur. Rotl Grotl is searching the jungle for the skink priest Itzi-Itl-Gy, who was supposed to bless the lizardman army that is soon to attack New Bechafen. Unknown to Rotl Grotl, poor Itzi-Itl-Gy was eaten by a swooping terradon a few days ago (see Extending the Adventure for ways for the PCs to find his corpse).

Rotl Grotl enjoys toying with his prey before eventually deciding that his carnosaur is hungry and needs a fresh meal. The GM should use Rotl Grotl and the carnosaur at key moments to scare the PCs and chase them in different directions. At first, the PCs may only hear the carnosaur roaring in the distance. But soon, the pair develops a knack for emerging at inopportune times. For example:

- The PCs are crossing a bridge.
- If the PCs are making too direct of a line towards New Bechafen, he appears to chase them down a different path.
- He appears alongside the PCs as they travel on the river, biting at them from overhangs.

The monument is surrounded by piles of countless fist-sized skulls, remnants of some long-lost lizard species, arranged meticulously in spiral patterns.

Anyone making an appropriate HISTORY roll identifies the idol as Adohi-Kumquata, a Slann mage-priest who lived thousands of years ago, but was slain by a kroxigor who had been mind-controlled by the dark elves.

Prying the kroxigor skull from the hand of the statue requires a ST roll vs. the crumbling hand's ST 16. Or, the statue can be chipped away – the stone fingers have DR 6, HP 20. However, if the skull is tampered with in any way, the ground rumbles and several tiny skulls scream towards anyone touching the statue with horrifying speed. Treat this as a shotgun-like ranged attack with skill 15, 1d+1 pi damage, RoF 1x7, Rcl 1.

The copper skull is heavy and weighs 50 lbs, but is highly valuable to artifact hunters and worth $5,000. Furthermore, the skull is feared by the skinks in the area, who believe that it still contains the dark elves' original curse, which enabled the betrayal of Adohi-Kumquata. No skink will willingly go within a few yards of the skull.

4 The Dreadwake

The turbulent river in this area is surrounded by steep, thirty-foot, basalt cliffs. A narrow rope bridge crosses the river here, but it is seldom used and looks to be in disrepair. A worn pothelm, made in the slavic style of Kislev, is visible in the middle of the bridge, not too far from a section where several boards are broken and rotting.

Climbing down the rocky cliff requires rope or a CLIMBING-1 roll. Anyone failing the roll slips and falls down the wall, although they can make a DX roll to kick off from the wall and try to land in the water. Falling on the rocks below does 3d cr damage; falling into the water does only 2d cr damage.

Crossing the bridge is easy enough, but requires a DX+2 roll to avoid stepping on clearly-rotten boards. Anyone who fails can make a second DX roll to grab on before falling to the river below (for 2d cr damage).

A second person on the bridge, however, causes it to sway, and a -1 to all DX rolls. A third person on the bridge seriously weakens it. Roll 3d. On a 15-16, a section of the bridge collapses, forcing at least one PC to make a DX roll to cling on for life. On a 17-18, the entire bridge snaps and collapses!

The Dead Kislevite

From the bridge, a Perception (Vision) roll spots the corpse of a Kislevite lying on a boulder in the middle of the river below, its location somehow protecting it from the carnivores of the jungle.

From below, the PCs can navigate to the Kislevite corpse by either swimming the rapids (Swimming-2), or leaping from rock to rock to get there, which requires three DX-2 rolls. The corpse looks to be several days old, and one of his arms has recently been eaten away by carnivorous fish.

The dead Kislevite still bears a fine scimitar in its sheath (sw+2 cut or thr+2 imp, reach 1), a fine large knife, and a pack containing rotten jerky, a letter to his wife (see Handout C), a small pouch with $40 silver coins, and a strange totem made with bronze rings, colorful feathers, and exotic bird bones – which unfortunately carries a Curse which infects all who touch it (-2 to all rolls until the subject scores a notable success!)

River Rafting

Rafting is the quickest way to get to New Bechafen, as it's only about a thirty minute trip. With some exploration of the banks, a Perception (Vision)-1 roll spots a small, well-crafted raft hidden in some thorny bushes not too far from the bridge. The boat, however, it is guarded by two diligent chameleon skink scouts, Okr and Ikr.

If the PCs don't find the skinks' raft, they may get the idea to build one of their own. Constructing a raft takes about an hour and requires an appropriate Survival-3 roll, Carpentry-1 roll, or Engineer (Ships)+2 roll. Rafts have ST/HP 58, Hnd/SR -2/2, Move 1, and can safely hold about four people. However, combat on a raft is at -4 to attack and -2 to defend.

Navigating the river is no easy feat. GMs may force the PCs to make a BOATING roll to launch their boat and avoid the sharp rocks. As they near locations 6 and 7, they may also have to face the winged ripperdactyls as well as a dreaded Terrorghorger.

6 Eldritch Archaeology

There are more ancient ruins in this clearing, long devoured by the hungry jungle. A few standing obelisks, dedicated to great Sotek remain here, jutting out amidst collapsed stone mounds and outlines of old building foundations. The rubble is strewn around in a such a way that navigating it is tricky – it is a virtual labyrinth of twists and turns.

Anyone venturing in the ruins at night hear the shrieks of jungle bats coming and going from the area; the place is swarming with them. Also visible at night, in the center of the ruins, is a small, glowing campfire which smokes with the smell of oily wood.

Camped in the middle of the ruins is the "young," two-hundred year old vampire, LOCHLAN HARKON, a distant relative of the lord of this coast.

Decades ago, Lochlan traveled from the northern lands of the Empire to Lustria to study the ruins and temples in this area. While these ruins are nothing new to him, he believes that a scroll he recently found points to a hidden chamber – the Celestial Socket – somewhere in the area.

Recently, however, Lochlan trusted servant, Flewdum, was eaten by a carnosaur when he went to go fetch firewood. While Lochlan is not one to normally grieve a mere mortal, Flewdum had been a loyal servant since his arrival in Lustria, and one that he had hoped to turn into a vampire after years of proving his worth. Lochlan sadly handles a small chest with the leftovers of Flewdum's supplies — some alchemical elixirs, and a fine, enchanted hatchet, still gripped by a severed and bloody hand.

Lochlan has warded the ruins with a spell that allows him to detect people entering the area, so it is nearly impossible to sneak up on him. He will summon the PCs to explain their presence. He is an intensely curious fellow, but only has interest in talking about subjects he cares about – ancient history, Lustrian and Elven artifacts, and the fauna and flora of the region. Tonight, he is morose and debating giving up his quest to find the lost chamber that brought him to this area.

- Lochlan barely keeps up with local Vampire Coast politics.
 He sours when the topic turns to New Bechafen and its residents.
- If asked about the carnosaur in the region, he'll say that he has seen a saurus warrior riding atop one. He recognized the saurus warrior as the famous Rotl Grotl, and suspects a larger attack is being organized on the vampires nearby (which he sees as no concern of his own).
- If asked for advice navigating back to New Bechafen, he advises the PCs to stay north of the river, as terradon mating season has made them especially bold to its south. He'll describe how he saw an especially large terradon grab a skink shaman, snip off its head, and fly off with it. If asked, he can direct the PCs to the corpse of the shaman (see Extending the Adventure).
- He'll also warn the PCs that there are vampire patrols who use magic to detect and detain people trying to sneak into the city who don't have a Letter of Passing from a known vampire. He's willing to write one... for a price, such as helping him find the Celestial Socket, or perhaps trading a precious artifact, such as the Bronze Kroxigor Skull from area 3, or the Blood Charm of Xahutec, the Tablet of Sotek, from the catacomb ruins.
- Lochlan doesn't hide why he's here at these ruins he loves talking about his various quests to find old Lustrian artifacts. If he senses anyone is interested in helping him, he'll escort the PCs to a nearby structure, where a bronze and decorated door – the Door of Ximeztli – hides longlost secrets. Lochlan will also show the PCs his scroll (see Handout D), saying that he has been unable to open the door, despite trying many rituals and spells suggested by the scroll.

If Lochlan is ever threatened during the conversation, his mood changes, and he becomes fierce and angry. He does not tolerate getting insulted by mortals who do not know their place. He will use his power and magic to chase them away from the ruins, summoning swarms of jungle bats to devour them if they are stupid enough to stay.

The Door of Ximeztli

The Door of Ximeztli (see Handout E) is a heavy limestone door located down a shallow staircase in the center of the ruins. It is carved with hundreds of spirals, each of which touches six glyphs of unknown origin. The glyphs are mentioned in Lochlan's scroll, and must be read out in the right order. However, one of the glyphs – "Tek-Alon-Patl" – is a forbidden word, never to be said out loud, else the speaker receives a 1-point Curse (-1 to all rolls, until some notable success is made). Realizing this requires reading the ancient Nehekharan on its border (which Lachlan does not know), making an appropriate THEOLOGY roll, or finding the clue hidden in the dead Kislevite's note at the river (area 4). Once the five glyphs are spoken in order, the door vibrates and slides open with old magic.

The Celestial Socket

There are seemingly two rooms in this lost chamber. The first chamber is soaked in water and mud, the result of an underground spring bursting through the stone floor. This room is covered in glyphs that tell an ancient story of the earliest generations of Slann and their battle against chaos. A pedestal in the northeast corner holds a golden eye, weighing 5 lbs and worth $2,000. Since the eye is non-magical, Lochlan cares little for it and gives it to the PCs to keep.

The east wall of the first chamber holds a circular portal. The nighttime sky is visible in the portal, but the stars swirl in beautiful patterns. This is the doorway to the celestial socket. Stepping through the portal places the PCs in the next chamber. Here, the floor is an intricate mosaic, decorated with tiles of jade and obsidian, forming an elaborate pattern of a celestial map. This map is the real treasure of this chamber – for hidden in the designs of the ancient stars are the secrets to powerful magic.

However, moments after entering this room, the weight of the PCs causes the floor to depress slightly. Suddenly, the room plunges into darkness, and the air is filled with the hiss of escaping gas. This isn't a deadly poison, but a magical, hallucinogenic gas.

As the gas fills the room, the celestial map on the floor comes alive, the jade and obsidian tiles starting to shift and rearrange themselves, forming confusing, ever-changing patterns. This creates a labyrinth of illusions designed to disorient and terrify intruders. PCs must make a WILL-3 roll to avoid the effects of the gas. If affected, the PCs see shadowy, lizard-like figures emerge from the walls. Born from the hallucinogenic mist, they hold out their hands and bolts of light strike at the PCs.

There is one figure per PC in the room. Treat each attack as Innate Attack-13, doing 2d-1 burn damage. Each illusionary figure has only a single hit point.

However, the real danger lies beneath the floor. With each move the PCs make across the room, they risk stepping on actual pressure plates which activate poison dart traps in the room. With each move, roll 3 dice. On a 9 or less, the PC steps on a pressure plate and a dart fires, doing 1d-1 pi- damage, but with a poison that forces a HT-2 roll, else the PC takes 1d damage and falls unconscious for an hour. When they awaken, they find themselves with a random mental disadvantage, such as Paranoia, Bloodlust, or a Delusion.

If the PCs are conscious a full minute in the chamber, the stars unfold themselves all around. Celestial magic pours into those willing to absorb it. This grants an additional level of Magery to any in the room that are awake. Also, those already with Magery will automatically receive the Divination spell (4 points worth).

6 Duel of Winged Terrors

As the PCs approach this part of the jungle, they notice that the trees here are exceptionally tall. Far atop the towering trees are giant nests made from an orange, coral-like material. An appropriate Survival, Area Knowledge, or Naturalist-2 roll identifies them as ripperdactyl roosts, the homes of large, winged lizards that are an angry orange combination of a velociraptor and a pterosaur. Anyone making the NATURALIST or separate Occultism roll will recall that the eggs of these creatures are especially prized, and often eaten by the very wealthy, or used in alchemical experiments.

During the day, the ripperdactyls can be seen far above, swooping back and forth from the river, where they grab heavy, spiked fish and take them back to their nests to feed the young. Avoiding the ripperdactyls takes some effort — they are keen eyed and especially enjoy warm mammal blood! Smart PCs will use Stealth, Camouflage, or some other trickery to advance through this area without catching the eyes of a curious flying carnivore. If they ever catch the attention of the ripperdactyls, one will fly down to investigate. If the PCs do not quickly dispatch the lone ripperdactyl, it will let out a long harsh screech and five more hungry predators will arrive.

At nighttime, large, undead gaunt-bats intrude on the ripperdacytl's territory. Created and trained by a vampiric sorcerer in New Bechafen, the bats steal the ripperdactyls' valuable eggs. This causes the ripperdactyls to swarm and fight the bats, causing a horrendous commotion in the area. While this skirmish makes it easier for the PCs to sneak through ripperdactyl territory, the noise may attract other predators, especially Rotl Grotl and his carnosaur, or a even a curious, fire breathing salamander.

The Fallen Ironbreaker

As the PCs make their way through this area, a Perception (Vision) roll spots the glint of gold metal in the middle of a grassy clearing. Getting to the clearing risks getting spotted by a particularly big ripperdactyl, who is hungrily devouring the intestines of a large fish on a branch above the clearing.

If the PCs are bold enough to get to the site, they'll find the bleached bones of a dead dwarf, his golden pothelm still gleaming under the soft soil here (treat as a fine dwarf-made heavy pothelm, DR 9, 5 lbs.). Nearby is a dwarven black powder dragoon pistol (2d pi+, Range 55/540, RoF 1, Shots 1 (20), Bulk -4), with a dry supply of powder in a silver powder horn (worth $100).

Terrorghorger Rapids

During the day, young ripperdactyls fly overhead in this area, diving in and out of the whitewater river to retrieve fat, slow-moving fish, then fly them back to their nests. Due to the abundance of fish, the carnivores will ignore most other prey (unless they are lured or taunted in some way).

The black volcanic rocks in the river here are especially sharp and dangerous. Anyone boating through this area must make a BOATING-3 roll to avoid the rocks, otherwise the raft takes Notes: The terrorghorger can project a torrent of toxic ink at its foes, which burns and dissolves their flesh. Treat this as an Acc 3 cone attack with a range of 10 yards, and a 3-yard width. The ink does 2d-1 toxic damage, and also chills brain and bones, forcing a FRIGHT CHECK-1.

2d+2 cr damage and risks getting flipped or trapped unless another BOATING roll is made. Anyone dumped from a boat must make a Swimming roll to get back ashore, or else they'll crack their bodies against the rocks or be washed down the river and mistaken for a fat fish by a ripperdactyl.

During dusk and the nighttime, this deep section of the river becomes exceptionally dangerous. Here, a grotesque abomination dwells under the river – a terrorghorger – a creature reminiscent of a squid, but far more sinister. Its tentacles, like the serpentine coils of malevolent constrictors, writhe with dark intent. Its gaping maw pulsates with an eerie crimson luminescence, echoing the burning of necromancy-fueled. Legend tells that this beast feasted upon the vitae of trapped vampires that dared traverse its watery home. It rarely awakens, but tonight it yearns, with a maddening thirst, to feast on blood.

As it emerges from the water to find prey, anyone seeing the creature must make a FRIGHT CHECK-3! While the terrorghorger prefers meals of undead, it is happy to slake its thirst on mortals. The creature, however, is not stupid – if it is heavily wounded (e.g., forced to make a HT roll from damage), it will let out a terrifying scream that mentally stuns everyone within sight, and then within a few turns attempt to move away and disappear underwater. Once out of sight, its rage will grow, and it will plan a return to kill the PCs yet again if it has the chance (e.g., at a bridge crossing).

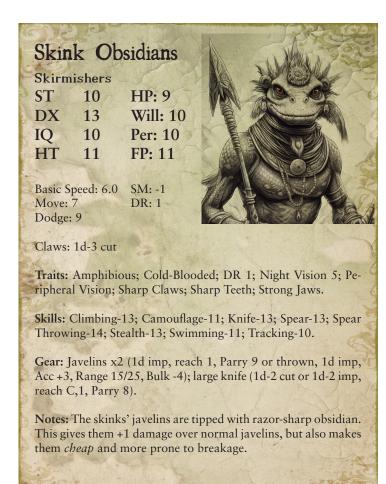

The Unnatural Death Rattle of the Terrorghorger

The death of the terrorghorger causes it to let out an earth-shattering death rattle – one so powerful and tempestuous that it shreds the body of the creature into thousands of leathery wet patches, and shakes the very foundations of the land, including New Bechafen.

The burst of necromantic energy released by the terrorghorger's death rattle forces all within 100 yards of the creature to make a Will roll or else take 1d-1 toxic damage, with no armor protecting. Furthermore, anyone with Magery, or vampires, are forced to roll HT-2 or else suffer from a bad migraine for one hour per point by which the roll is failed (-2 to all mental skill rolls). Lesser undead in the region, including the many guards of New Bechafen, are effectively dazed for the remainder of the day, making it easy for the PCs to sneak through the town.

The Fruit of Xtli

Along this shallow river bank are hundreds of tall reeds jutting from the water. From the top of their stems grow purple fruit which leak bright green goo. A dozen docile skinks, much smaller than normal, gently pick the fruit from the stems, placing them carefully in baskets made from the same green reeds. The fruit is a favorite of Lord Xtli, a Slaan mage-priest who sleeps hundreds of miles from here. His skink servants pick fresh ones for him, hoping that when he awakens, he will be delighted by their diligence. He has yet to awaken in over three centuries.

Anyone making a Naturalist, Herb Lore, Alchemy, or Survival (Jungle)-2 roll identifies the fruit as a rare treat. Furthermore, treating a wound with the sap of these branches makes for an effective salve. Anyone making a First Aid roll while using the sap automatically rolls the maximum healing allowed for the attempt (usually 4 HP). If carefully collected, there is enough sap here to make 1d doses of ointment.

9 A Sweet Smell of Skinks

The dense foliage here is home to an unusual orange flower, aetherisus dulcisillus. Its delicate, velvety petals spiral gracefully around a luminescent core. However, those who spend several minutes within range of this flora must make a HT roll or begin to mildly hallucinate, seeing the flowers sway and wave in a beautiful, hypnotic dance. This is distracting, and causes a -2 to IQ and DX-based rolls while in this area! The effect also causes the victims to desire to cover themselves in the flowers' pollen, which effectively ruins stealth attempts against creatures that sense prey with their olfactory senses (-5 penalty to Stealth and Camouflage rolls). Once someone is covered in the sweet smell of these flowers, the scent lingers for 12 hours. A quick bath in the river will reduce this down to about 1 hour.

Those with herbal talents (e.g., Naturalist, Alchemy, or a suitable professional skill) recall that perfume can be made from these flowers. A successful DX-based Naturalist roll will let someone successfully harvest the flowers, which can later be turned into perfume and sold for $500!

Hidden in this seemingly peaceful grove is a war party of a dozen skink skirmishers (assume 2-3 per PC). Assigned to scout the area around New Bechafen ahead of a larger invasion, they will be well-camouflaged when the PCs arrive, night or day. The skinks are cautious, and will only attempt an outright attack if they believe that the PCs are either incapacitated due to the flowers' pollen, or can otherwise get the jump on them. Otherwise, they will pelt the PCs with a volley of javelins and then withdraw into the brush.

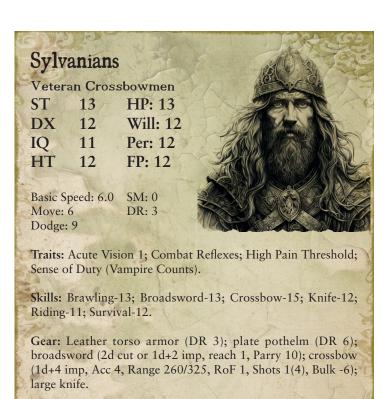

The Bridge to New Bechafen

An old Gothic stone bridge spans the rushing river here. Its dark, weathered stones are adorned with intricate carvings of winged creatures and dark magic, bearing the marks of old vampiric craftsmanship. Massive man-sized bats roost under the bridge, and at nightfall come rushing with shrieks that can pierce eardrums (any living creature nearby when this happens must make a HT roll or take 1d-1 cr damage from the effect).

A handful of Grave Levy (p. 19) guard this bridge night and day. What's more, a small patrol of seasoned Sylvanian crossbowmen – paid well by Harkon to shoot down any Terrordactyls that attempt to prey off travelers – assist in keeping watch. GM's should assume that there are roughly two guards per PC.

The commander of the crossbowmen, JAM-RYCH VON NILCH, is in tight charge of his men, and will interrogate any who wish to pass the bridge who do not look familiar to him. If the PCs have obtained a Letter of Passing from Lochlan Harkon, Jamrych will begrudgingly let them pass into the city without incident.

Notes: The silver-haired captain of the crossbowmen, Jamrych von Nilch, is clever and very loyal to his men. He has IQ 12, Leadership-12, Tactics-12, and Interrogation-12.

Otherwise, if the PC did not dally much and arrived at the bridge before the sun has risen, Jamrych will not yet have been alerted to their escape from the tavern. He will let them pass into the city as long as they have a convincing story that well-explains their presence. Otherwise, Jamrych will likely recognize the fugitives, and use trickery to lure them close to the bridge, for example, calling out to them and saying that he has a message from their ship. But then, when the PCs least expect it, he will try to cut them down as they attempt to cross the bridge!

Once the bridge is crossed, a ten-minute walk along a worn cobblestone road leads to the open gates of New Bechafen.

GM's Note: If the PCs approach this bridge from below – for example, if they took a boat along the river – they'll have to climb up the embankment to get to the bridge, which is a tough, ten yard climb, requiring a CLIMBING+2 roll. If the PCs can't make the climb, they can travel further down the river to level ground and approach the city from the beaches.

ESCAPE FROM NEW BECHAFEN

Now that the PCs have returned to New Bechafen, they must make their way to the port so that they can escape on a ship.

New Bechafen has three entry points: the South Gate, near the stone bridge, the West Gate, and the port itself, which is largely contained within its walls (a smaller, older North Port is outside the city walls, but mostly contains empty warehouses and has no ships docked here).

- If the PCs approach from the bridge to the south and successfully outwit or overcome Jamrych and the guards they can simply walk into the city through the open, unguarded South Gate. They will be able to make their way to the port within a few minutes without much ado.
- If the PCs approach from the North Port, they'll have to dodge some patrols of Grave Levy who search for escaped slaves or stragglers who might make good food for their vampire lords. From here, they'll have to approach the central port either from the beaches (risking being seen from the walls, see below), or climbing from a warehouse to the walls and then down again, which requires some good athletic skills (e.g., a CLIMBING roll or two and a DX roll to make the leap to the walls).
- If the PCs approach from the West Gate, they will find it heavily guarded. At dozen - Grave Levy are stationed outside, keeping watch for any lizardmen attackers that are rumored to be on the loose. Crossbowmen man the walls here as well.

- If the PCs approach from any other location, such as the beaches, they will likely be seen approaching by several of the guards who man the walls of the town. The guards will immediately deploy a Grave Levy (2 per PC) to intercept and apprehend them, while being observed by a few Sylvanian novice crossbowmen, who can target them from the walls. These crossbowmen have Perception 11 and Crossbow-12, but the -10 range penalty to any shots from the walls to the beaches gives them an effective aimed skill of 8, for 1d+4 imp damage on a hit. If the levy is defeated, the PCs can race along the beaches into the port.

No matter their approach, as the PCs enter the area around the city, a Perception (Vision)+2 roll spots a monstrous winged creature searching the skies. The creature is twice the mass of a man, and has both wolf and bat features. An Occultism or appropriate History roll identifies it as a devolved Vampire Lord, STURSUL THE VARGHULF, a creature who has succumbed willingly to its most primal urges, set loose on the world only when more powerful masters need it to perform special missions.

The Port

As long as the PCs are cautious, they can make their way through the town's streets to the port without event. Once they reach the port, they have a final decision to make. They can make their way back to their ship, the Grimmest Gale, or stow aboard another one of the two merchant ships in the port, the fine three-master the Raven's Wrath or the creaky old Duskbane.

Spying on the Grimmest Gale, the PCs will see nothing out of the ordinary – just the familiar crew waiting nervously for the PCs. The captain of the ship, Captain Drossel, will not be seen. Unbeknownst to the PCs, Nicole Morvant, the vampire who originally tried capturing them, has killed the captain, commandeered the ship, and is awaiting their return inside!

The two other ships in port do not have such ambushes awaiting the PCs. They have, however, have been alerted that the PCs are wanted fugitives, so no sailors will willingly let them aboard those ships unless bribed handsomely (at least $1000). Even then, there is always a traitor that will report the PCs' presence to the town's authorities, who will unleash the Varghulf upon them as any ship leaves the coast!

The Battle on the Grimmest Gale

If the PCs return to their galleon, the ship will immediately make preparations to leave. However, just as the PCs believe that they have escaped – or begin to suspect a ruse – the door to the captain's cabin crashes open and Nicole Morvant emerges to challenge them. She casts Agonize on the nearest foe to intimidate them into submission, and then blows a small shell whistle , which has the effect of summoning a large Grave Levy (at least three per PC) shambling up the gangplanks to the boat, as well as the dreaded Varghulf to swoop down upon the deck of the ship in seconds.

The crew of the Grimmest Gale will join in the fight. GMs can ask for a Leadership roll or similar social skill to inspire more of them to fight. On a success, the crew will engage the Grave Guard and keep them out of combat as the PCs deal with Nicole Morvant and the Varghulf

Escaping on the Raven's Wrath or Duskbane

If the PCs stowed away on one of the two other ships, they will have successfully avoided Nicole Morvant... who is still hiding in the captain's quarters of the Grimmest Gale. However, unless perfect precautions are made, a spy has seen the PCs enter the new ship to make their getaway. This spy reports to Nicole Morvant that the PCs are making their escape... and she uses her conch to call the Varghulf upon them as they escape the harbor.

The battle should play out similar as it does above, but with fewer combatants since Nicole Morvant and her grave guard will be unable to enter the fray. However, the PCs must make

Attack on the Town

As the PCs are making their way back to New Bechafen to escape the Vampire Coast, hundreds of lizardmen in the region have stealthy gathered on the outskirts of New Bechafen. Rotl Grotl, along with a couple hundred skink skirmishers are hiding in the jungle, waiting for the right time to test the defenses. Their plan is to provoke the vampires into marching a force to the north, and then having a larger army of Saurus and Kroxigor attack the valuable plantations to the south.

Most of this war is out of the scope of this adventure, but the PCs will see signs of it. If the PCs have noticed that the lizardmen seem to be up to something, the attack on the town begins just as the PCs are nearing it. Dozens of skirmishers erupt from the jungle firing blowpipes and throwing javelins at the guards on the walls, trying to lure the vampire lords themselves into mounting a counterattack. This will provide a good distraction for the PCs to get into the town. Furthermore, if the PCs somehow lure Rotl Grotl into to the town, he'll explode through the gates, causing chaos and confusion everywhere in New Bechafen. His assault will distract the Varghulf, who will swoop down to confront him!

a Leadership or similar roll to get any of these crews to fight on their behalf. If the PCs successfully inspire sailors to their aide, the Raven's Wrath will supply better equipped trained troops over the Duskbane.

CONCLUSION

With a bold plan, the PCs leave port having escaped a horrific fate. Despite their victory, they're left with a grim realization: in this world, they must prepare for danger lurking in every deal, for there may be more than meets the eye in every transaction on the grim, Vampire Coast. The journey has transformed them from mere merchants to grizzled survivors.

For successfully completing this adventure, the PCs should receive 3 character points. They should receive an additional 1-2 character points for good roleplaying. Surviving the Vampire Coast will also likely earn them a positive Reputation among other merchants and sailors. Great success may also earn PCs appropriate Patrons, Contacts, or Enemies.

EXTENDING THE ADVENTURE

One unresolved plot point in Roar of the Terrorghorger is the fate of Itzi-Itl-Gy the skink shaman that was supposed to bless the lizardman army as they test the walls of New Bechafen. However, as the skink was making his through the jungle, he was picked up by a lone terradon. Beheaded in the attack, his body fell to the jungle floor below. Now, Rotl Grotl and others are looking for him, for he carried a special magic item with him.

The PCs can find Itzi-Itl-Gy in two ways. First, Lachlan Harkon saw the attack, and vaguely recalls where the body landed. He was curious to examine the corpse -- he knows skink shamans often carry magical items -- but was too upset over the loss of his manservant to make the trip. He can give PCs directions, which will lead them to the area about three-quarters of a mile south of the terrorghorger rapids (south of area 7).

Or, the GM can drop Itzi-Itl-Gy's body at a different location, or let PCs with tracking find a trail of blood and terradon spoor lead them to its location.

When the PCs find the body it is buzzing with jungle flies. Approaching these are dangerous – they'll form a swarm and attack anyone nearby, though will quickly return to the corpse after giving chase for about 10 yards. The fly swarm has Move 6, does 1 HP/turn damage unless the victim is completely protected, and disperses after losing 12 HP. Most weapons only do 2 HP damage, with impaling and piercing attacks doing only 1 HP damage.

Still gripped in the dead, clawed hand of Itzi-Itl-Gy is a short staff made from an alien, two-tone metal. Copper and a strange blue metal intertwine elaborately on the staff. At its end is an icon of the sun, with an amber gemstone at its center. Anyone with Magery will detect that the staff is magical. This is the Staff of the Lost Sun, a very fine short staff enchanted with a rarer version of the Sunbolt spell. With a mere thought, the staff shoots out up to three beams of light. It has 1/2D 75, Max 300, Acc 2, RoF 3, Rcl 1, and uses the Innate Attack (Beam) skill. It does 1d-1 burn damage per two energy spent up to six energy. The stone at the staff's end is a 12-point dedicated powerstone.

The beast typically all-out attacks, ignoring any blows leveled towards it until its master, Rotl Grotl, steers it in a different direction.

Dearest Capt. Drossel,

It is I, Baron Charybdis. I trust this letter finds you in good health. I have a proposition that will prove mutually beneficial.

I request you bring forth one hundred crates of the finest Bell Wine into the port of New Bechefen by the forthcoming full moon. Once your task is complete, disembark and make your way to the Gravesend Inn. There, we shall meet in the confines of its ancient walls to finalize our negotiation.

I must, however, issue a word of caution. Lord Harkon has been ill of late, and New Bechefen has been plagued by terrible creatures of the night, not all of whom share my... diplomacy. The new vampires harbor malevolent intent and mean to do you harm, although you will be safe at the inn by Harkon's law. I urge you to be vigilant, and not to linger after sundown. Trust not the shadows nor the locals who shy away from the light.

I eagerly await our rendezvous. Until then, keep your wits about you and your vessel well-guarded.

Yours in the eternal night,

Baron Charybdis

PLEASE I beg youfind my son Gresmar at the Gravesend Inn wher he is hiding. Take him away from heere on your ship. His life and my happyness depends on this. He is a good boy and yuseful at boat work. I will be forver in your det.

Handout B - Note slipped to the PCs in New Bechafen begging them to rescue Gresmar.

My wife Aelis, Alas, on my one-hundredth day in Lustria, I have been cursed. I had spent a week with the skinks of Chaqua, learning their old language and studying their artifacts. It was on a strange metal orb that I saw the sacred word written -Tek-Alon-Patl. which I said aloud. Little did I know that it is forbidden to utter that word. No one speaks it for fear of the gods. The skinks grew angry and exiled me, but ill luck followed me everywhere, and still follows me today. Now, I must head back to New Bechafen to find aeons-old sorcerer who can remove my curse. Then, I swear to you, I will finish my explorations, return to you, and we will make our home in kisler as I have promised. -Your beloved Bishenko

Of the Door of Kimeztli, on the pootstep of the Gelestial Socket, the entrance is quarded by six glyphs, carved there long before Itarkon's arrival. To open the door, the glyphs must be spoken aloud in the correct order on the door: first the right column, from top to bottom. Then the left column, from bottom to top.

Vow of Sigmar: Obey orders, always aid dwarf-folk, promote the unity of the Empire, allegiance to the throne, root out green-skins and chaos without mercy

When the elderly captain of the Grimmest Gale announced that he planned to take crates of rare Bell Wine to the Vampire Coast, he knew he could not leave port without a Sigmarite aboard his ship. In the days since you left the Empire behind you, you have earned Captain Drossel's trust. Now, he's asked you to personally strike the final bargain for the wine with Baron Charybdis - a supposedly "trustwor-thy" vampire lord. You are to meet him at the Gravesend Inn, the only "safe" tavern in the vampire-infested town of New Bechafen. May Sigmar watch you closely this day, for the light of Sigmar shines through you and before you no darkness can prevail.

Three years ago the Empire forced your college of magic to go to war in Lustria. For six months you fought on the front lines, barraging ranks of lizardmen with fireballs and fire clouds. But the war was lost, and you retreated back to the empire, scarred by your experiences, and angry that your own promotion was passed over in favor of less accomplished wizards. Several weeks ago, an old captain of a merchant vessel agreed to pay you well to return to the continent... in exchange for protecting a group of his merchants while they made a deal in New Bechafen, a town infamous for being under the sway of vampire lords. Needing the money... you agreed.

You've been Captain Drossel's close friend for 20 years, the last five of which you've spent sailing with him on CHARACTER NOTES the Grimmest Gale, advising him all matters that do not involve monetary transactions. He even lets you practice minor alchemical experiments onboard the board, with only a few rules you are required to follow. Recently, you suggested to him that he meet with some Bretonnian traders to purchase some rare Bell Wine, a wine highly valued on the Vampire Coast due to its ability to make men immune to jungle fevers. Now, you've been tasked to bringing the wine to the coast, and helping complete the trade to the vampire lord Baron Charybids.

As an unliving vampire, you are less vulnerable to piercing and impaling damage. You suffer no additional damage from impaling damage (x1), and less from piercing (x1/3). When you reach -10xHP, you are still alive, but unconscious, but only wake up when you are positive HP.

You were a lowly gravedigger, ordered to bury bodies in the fens outside New Bechafen whenever a vampire demanded it. For years, you buried thousands of bodies. But last week, one of those bodies wasn't dead - it was vicious and horrible and bloodthirsty, draining you even as you tossed it into the grave that you had dug for it. The next thing you remember, you woke in the hot and humid wild with a thirst for human blood. You know what you became that night, but you are terrified of it. Now, you skulk around New Bechafen, snatching servants and slaves when you can't resist the thirst anyone, praying that you don't make an enemy of one of the town's true Vampire Lords.
